Mr. TILLMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina demands the yeas and nays. Is there a second? [After a pause.] Only six Senators voting in the affirmative, unless there is a call for a division the Chair will state that not a sufficient number have seconded the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLAPP. I suggest the want of a quorum.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to withdraw the motion for an executive session, as the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] has an important bill to introduce, and he wishes to make a few remarks upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask the Senator from Utah if it is not his intention to include other morning business.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest that the morning business shall be first transacted.

CREATION OF INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to create an industrial commission and defining its powers and duties, and I desire briefly to explain the bill.

The bill (S. 7970) to create an industrial commission and defining its powers and duties was read twice by its title.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the bill which I have introduced creates an industrial commission and defines its powers and duties.

The commission is to consist of seven members. They are to be appointed by the President and subject to removal by him for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. The term of the office is seven years.

The bill further provides for the removal by Congress of any commissioner by a vote of three-fifths of each House. This is to be a congressional commission of the same nature as the Interstate Commerce Commission, and, since it is created to carry out the policy and intention of Congress, according to rules which it prescribes, it seems to me that Congress should have the power to remove the commissioners if they fail to properly discharge the functions of their office. This proposed policy may meet opposition because it is an innovation, but, in my opinion, it is not only reasonable but desirable. It may be argued that Congress might act from partisan motives, as it frequently does in determining contests for membership in its own body, but the bill provides that the vacancy caused by a congressional removal is to be filled by the President in the usual way, so that while Congress can create a vacancy it can not fill it. That duty is left with the President, which, in my judgment, would make removals for partisan purposes improbable. They would be no more likely to occur than if removals were left wholly in the hands of the Executive.

The first 12 sections of the bill provide for the organization of the commission, define the scope of its operations, and give it the authority to secure the information necessary to carry out the purposes for which it is created. The Bureau of Corporations is merged into and made a part of the commission. The commission is given authority over every person, firm, copartnership, corporation, or joint-stock association that is doing an interstate business whose gross receipts exceed $5,000,000 per annum, and it is given authority to investigate the financial conditions, business operations, and management of all such concerns. It can require of them any information which it deems necessary for the proper discharge of its duties, and anyone refusing to comply with such demand is liable to punishment. To make a false report to the commission or to knowingly give it false information is made a penal offense.

Section 13 is intended to prevent the watering of stock, and requires that within three years the water be squeezed out of existing overcapitalized industries.

Section 14 limits the fees that may be paid to promoters for merging smaller corporations into larger ones, and is intended to prevent the evil practices so common in this character of corporation combinations.

Section 15 declares that any contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or a conspiracy in restraint of trade shall be presumed to be unreasonable, and the burden of proof is placed on the corporation or joint-stock association to show that such combination or agreement or contract is not an unreasonable restraint of trade. This is intended to remedy as nearly as possible the evil which grows out of the decisions of the Supreme Court in the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases, wherein the court legislated the word "reasonable" into the Sherman antitrust law.

Sections 16, 17, 18, and 19 define certain acts and practices that are commonly indulged in by corporations in creating monopolies as unreasonable restraints of trade and violations of law.

The sections following 19 give the commission its drastic power and authorize it to investigate the operations of any of these concerns doing an interstate business, and to find whether or not they have violated the provisions of this act or of any other law of the United States against the restraint of trade. The commission is given authority to submit the result of these investigations to the Department of Justice for its action or to bring suits upon its own motion, either in its own name or in the name of the United States; that is, the act confers upon an industrial commission the authority over industrial concerns that the Interstate Commerce Commission now has with respect to the railroads.

The commission can bring suits under this law or under the Sherman antitrust law, or under any other law of the United States that seeks to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, except an act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887, commonly known as the interstate-commerce act. Any investigation in regard to the conduct of any one subject to the jurisdiction of the bill may be made by the commission either upon complaint or upon its own initiative, and if the commission finds that a corporation, copartnership, firm, person, or joint-stock association is violating the provisions of this act, or any of the laws relating to the restraint of trade other than the interstate-commerce law referred to, it is directed to order such concern to desist and prescribe rules for it to follow in the operation of its business. If the party continues to violate the law, fails to obey the orders of the commission, or to follow the rules laid down by it, authority is given the commission to appoint a receiver for the concern and take possession of its property and wind up the business. This will probably be regarded as the most radical feature of the bill, but I am prepared to defend its wisdom. In case a receiver is appointed for a corporation or joint-stock association, it becomes his duty to call a meeting of the stockholders of the corporation, and they are required to determine whether or not they will elect officers for the corporation who will conduct its business in harmony with the law and the rules prescribed by the commission; and in the event that the stockholders refuse to elect such officers, then the receiver is directed to wind up the business of the corporation and distribute the proceeds among the stockholders pro rata, according to their several interests.

This bill, in short, creates an industrial commission, giving it the power over industrial concerns that the Interstate Commerce Commission has over transportation companies and which the Comptroller of the Currency has over national banks. It has combined the power and authority of these two governmental agencies into one commission and given it supervision over industrial establishments that engage in interstate trade.

The appointment of a receiver is not to interfere with any criminal prosecutions that may be determined upon. Suits brought by the Department of Justice or by the commission proceed as usual, but while these suits are pending and dragging their weary way for years through the courts the violations of the law will not be permitted to go on as they do now. They will be immediately stopped. The commission is authorized, if the interest of the public requires, to take possession of the property and operate it, and in the meantime the stockholders are given an opportunity to elect officers who will conduct the business in a legal way, and then the property is turned over to these new officers, while the criminal prosecution against the violators of the law is in no way interfered with. The purpose is to protect the people with some degree of promptness from the extortionate practices of powerful corporations without destroying the business which they represent. Because of the relation of some of these concerns to our industrial life, the continuance of their business might be a public necessity, so the bill undertakes to cure the evil without destroying the business.

Neither will it interfere with big business operations if such operations are along honest and creditable lines. It will not stop the growth of any big concern, provided that concern grows by honest methods. If it can produce a commodity in the fair and open field of competition at a less cost than its rivals, then it has the widest opportunity for success. The bill imposes no handicap upon energy, intelligence, or genius, but it does impose drastic restraints upon the use of intrigue and dishonesty to destroy business competitors.

The ineffectiveness of the courts or the Department of Justice to supervise big business has been clearly demonstrated in the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases. I do not believe that it is the province of the courts to supervise business. Their function is to decide what the law is, not to administer it in a legislative or executive capacity. It is not the province of the court or of the Attorney General, but of Congress, to fix the rules and prescribe the methods which such concerns shall follow in the management of their business when it affects interstate commerce.

I believe that the appointment of a receiver for a corporation that persistently violates the law will be far more effective in stopping the abuse that is growing out of the monopolization of our market place by giant industries than have been the indictments under the Sherman antitrust law. This bill, however, does not in any way weaken the power of the Sherman antitrust law. That law stands intact with all the potency that the courts have permitted it to retain. Every power which that law now has is preserved. We are simply providing additional means for more effectively controlling trusts, combinations, and monopolies.

Aside from the powers which are conferred upon the commission, there are two distinct features of the bill that have not heretofore been proposed in legislation of this kind. I refer to the provision enabling Congress to remove members of a commission by resolution and the authority for the commission to appoint a receiver to take possession of an industrial institution if those in control have refused to obey the law, and to require the stockholders to elect officers who will run it in a lawful way or to wind up its affairs.

I commend this bill to the careful consideration of every Senator and hope that the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which it has been referred, will give it prompt consideration. The American people will not much longer submit to a few men monopolizing the business of the country. Some remedy must be provided speedily, and I am convinced that this bill offers an effective and safe way of curing these growing evils without endangering our industrial stability or prosperity.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas a question with reference to one phase of his bill. I understood him to say that his bill provided that the proposed industrial commission—which, of course, is to be purely an administrative body—should be given the power to appoint a receiver. Is that correct?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Has the Senator investigated the question as to whether or not it would be competent for Congress to confer that power upon an administrative body, and whether it is not purely a judicial function?

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, the Comptroller of the Currency appoints receivers for national banks; such receivers are executive officers, and I do not see why a commission could not be authorized to do the same thing. If Congress can authorize the Comptroller of the Currency to appoint a receiver for a national bank, which is a corporation, why can it not authorize a commission to appoint a receiver for any other corporation?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

AMENDMENT TO AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to expend an additional 20 per cent of the moneys received from the national forests during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and also an additional 20 per cent of all moneys received during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, for the construction and maintenance of roads and trails within the national forests in the State from which such proceeds are derived, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the agricultural appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

TRANSPORTATION OF FRANKABLE MATTER.

Mr. KENYON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 421), which was read, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

EXPENSE OF CARRYING SEEDS, ETC.

Mr. KENYON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 422), which was read, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General furnish to the Senate an estimate, if possible for him so to do, of the expense to the Government for the last four years of the carrying of seeds, plants, and bulbs franked through the mails.

FREE DISTRIBUTION OF SEED.

Mr. KENYON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 423), which was read, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture furnish to the Senate an estimate of the expense to the Government for the last four years of purchasing or securing seeds, bulbs, plants, trees, etc., for free distribution by Members of Congress and the total number of packages so furnished. Also the expense of preparing the same for such free distribution and delivery of same to the mails.

INVESTIGATION OF CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 418) submitted by Mr. CLAPP on the 4th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That Senate resolution 79, agreed to August 26, 1912, be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting, in line 2, page 2, of said resolution, after the word "eight," the words "November 5, 1912."

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I make the point of order that this resolution calls for the expenditure of money, and, under Rule XXV, should go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I had, of course, anticipated that that point of order would be made. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this is simply an amendment to a resolution which did go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. If the point made by the Senator from Pennsylvania is well taken, then whenever a resolution involving an expenditure goes to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and comes back before this body for action, no motion to amend that resolution can be entertained until the motion to amend has in turn been referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

I have not myself looked the matter up, but I had my clerk this morning look it up with a good deal of care, and he assures me that, while the original resolution, Senate resolution 79, went to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and was reported back, the subsequent resolution, Senate resolution 386, the resolution submitted by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], amending the original resolution and very materially enlarging the duties and the possible expenditures to be incurred by the committee, was passed by the Senate without any action on the part of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

All that the pending resolution does is to amend a resolution which in regular form went to that committee, was reported back by that committee, and adopted by the Senate. That resolution omitted from the scope of the inquiry of the committee the expenditures in the presidential campaign and congressional campaign of 1912; it covered the campaigns of 1904 and 1908 and also the primary campaign of 1912, but it left the committee without authority to inquire into the expenses of the presidential and congressional campaigns in the election held on the 5th of November, 1912. Inasmuch as the committee during some three or four months upon the authority of the resolution No. 79 has been obliged to delve amidst the catacombs of the past, it strikes me that it is within the power of the Senate, and clearly within the duty of the Senate, to authorize the committee to include in their investigations the expenses of the campaign itself of 1912.

I submit, Mr. President, that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have no disposition to obstruct the committee, which has been so industriously endeavoring to ascertain whether or not an undue amount of money has been spent in our presidential campaigns; and I confess I was very much startled when I read of the enormous contributions that had been made to the campaign of 1904. It was illuminating to me.

On the point of order, Mr. President, the function of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate—and their authority does not go beyond that fact—is to ascertain whether or not there is money in the contingent fund to prosecute an inquiry.

When the original resolution was offered, the Committee on Contingent Expenses satisfied themselves of the fact that the money would be forthcoming, if called for. It is true that that resolution was subsequently amended without dissent, and to that extent the Senator has a precedent for asking that we further amend it. But it does seem to me, Mr. President, considering what is the function of that committee, and its only function, that when we propose to expend more money, that committee ought to be given an opportunity to say whether or not it is a wise investment of the public funds; and for that reason it seems to me very clear that the point of order having been made the resolution ought to go to that committee, as it would if this was an original proposition.

In saying this, Mr. President, I want to be distinctly understood as not putting myself in any attitude of obstruction to this proposed further investigation, if it is thought desirable to make it; but if we pass a simple resolution asking for an investigation that will cost $500 we might continue by amending that resolution to authorize an expenditure of $50,000, and the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate would have no opportunity to ascertain from the proper official whether or not the money was in hand.

And so, Mr. President, viewing it in that light, it seems to me that the matter ought to go to that committee, although personally I have very little interest in it. Whatever the Chair decides, of course, will be right.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I have not heard all that has been said in respect to this matter. The point of order was made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], and he has not pointed out, nor have I heard pointed out by anyone else, anything in any of the rules of the Senate that deprives the Senate of its right to pass a resolution of this character. Surely a majority of the Senate has a right to pass a resolution of this sort unless there is some rule that explicitly forbids it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The statute.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have not had an opportunity to examine it, and the provision, if any there is, that forbids it has not been pointed out. Everybody knows that the Senate will provide the funds, if any are necessary, and it does seem to me that this is an obstruction, whether so intended or not. It is simply interposing a barrier against an investigation that can not be hurtful to the right. Certainly the country is entitled to know the facts. It can do no harm to those who have had charge of campaigns to give publicity to what they have done. I had hoped that there would be no technical barrier attempted to be interposed here to deprive the Senate of the privilege of enlarging the jurisdiction of a committee which has already been authorized to take up this general subject, and I know of no rule against it. As I said, I have not given any particular scrutiny to the rules, and I am very much surprised that a technical rule should be resorted to to prevent the light of day from shining on whatever has taken place in the last campaign or any other campaign.

I feel that the resolution is in order, and whether in order or not, I would regret very much to see it hindered and delayed by a technical objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia means that I have raised any technical objection, I want now to disclaim that. During my service here a great many resolutions have been offered proposing to take money from the contingent fund, and immediate consideration has been asked. The fact is that there is not any rule governing it, but there is a statute law governing it, providing that all such resolutions shall go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Now, if the Senate wishes to put itself on record as saying that when a resolution is passed providing for taking a small amount of money from the contingent fund, that resolution can from time to time be amended without any action on the part of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, so it can be multiplied tenfold or a hundredfold, I have no objection to the Senate establishing that principle. But I can not fail to think that it is not a correct procedure when a point of order is made against the resolution. I did not make the point of order, and I speak simply because I think the rule, if construed as I think it ought to be, would recognize that the point of order is well taken. However it may be decided by the Chair, I shall be content.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. What is the difference between this form of amendment and if, when the original resolution had come back from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, an amendment had been offered, not only probably but quite surely increasing the expenses as compared with the expenses possible under the resolution as reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate? If the contention here maintained is tenable, no resolution reported by that committee could be amended on the floor of the Senate so as to increase the expenses without being referred back to the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. My answer to that, Mr. President, is that I do not think it is the function of that committee to suggest legislation. The function of that committee is simply to inquire of the disbursing officer of the Senate—and I served a long time on that committee and know the procedure—whether or not the fund is at hand to warrant the inquiry; and if the committee reports that, in its judgment, the money is in hand or will be provided, then action is taken.

But I do not care to go into technicalities or refinements about the question. It is in the hands of the Presiding Officer to decide, and I know he will decide it very wisely.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will indulge me, the Chair is ready to rule, unless the Senator has something additional to say.

Mr. OLIVER. I rather think, Mr. President, in view of what has been said by the senior Senator from Virginia, that I ought to disclaim any intention to interpose what he terms a technical objection to this proposition. My only objection to the adoption of the resolution at this time is that if we are going to adopt a resolution of this kind, we ought to do it according to the rules of the Senate; and the rule of the Senate is distinct, and it is mandatory.

Rule XXV states that among the standing committees of the Senate shall be—

A Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to consist of five Senators, to which shall be referred all resolutions directing the payment of money out of the contingent fund of the Senate or creating a charge upon the same.

Now, Mr. President, that is distinct in that it gives the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate the right to say whether any money shall be expended for an investigation by any committee.

The Senator from Minnesota refers to the original resolution and the resolution enlarging the duties of this committee, and he says that the latter was not referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Two wrongs do not make a right, and if this point of order had been made at that time I think unquestionably it would have been sustained by the Chair and that the resolution enlarging the duties of the committee would have been referred at that time to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

Mr. OLIVER. I am going to speak only a minute or two, and I desire to conclude.

I want to disclaim, Mr. President, any intention to obstruct or prevent the passage of this resolution. I am free to say that I think it is absolutely unnecessary. The reason for investigation connected with the campaigns of 1904 and 1908 does not exist with regard to the campaign of 1912. There is a publicity law now in force which compels the different committees to report. They have made their reports.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator to the fact that the merits of the resolution are not before the Senate. It is simply a question of order.

Mr. OLIVER. I beg pardon, Mr. President. Now, I wish to say that if it shall not be considered a precedent for future action, and I can do so, I am perfectly willing to withdraw the point of order and to allow the resolution to pass, so far as I am concerned; but I will submit to the Chair in that respect.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then the point of order is withdrawn, is it not?

SEVERAL SENATORS. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair feels that it is its duty to give direction to the resolution according to the rules governing the Senate; and the Chair will have the law read; not the rule of the Senate which has already been read, but the statute law enacted by Congress. The Secretary will read the extract from the statute law.

The Secretary read as follows:

Hereafter no payment shall be made from the contingent fund of the Senate unless sanctioned by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, or from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives unless sanctioned by the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives. And hereafter payments made upon vouchers approved by the aforesaid respective committees shall be deemed, held, and taken and are hereby declared to be conclusive upon all the departments and officers of the Government: Provided, That no payment shall be made from said contingent funds as additional salary or compensation to any officer or employee of the Senate or House of Representatives. (25 Stats., p. 546.)

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, may I ask that the statute be read again, so far as the Senate is concerned? My attention was diverted a moment and I did not hear it.

The Secretary read as follows:

Hereafter no payment shall be made from the contingent fund of the Senate unless sanctioned by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that this purports to be an amendment to a resolution which has already been reported favorably by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses. This is a proposition to amend that resolution, which has been reported by a committee and passed by the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may ask a question, does the resolution make a charge on the contingent fund, whether it is an amendment or not? I ask for information, as I was not here when the debate began. Does the resolution make an additional charge?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It enlarges the scope of the duties of the committee.

Mr. LODGE. Does it make an additional charge upon the contingent fund?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution speaks for itself, and the Chair will have it read. It is not the duty of the Chair to interpret the resolution. The Secretary will again read the resolution.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That Senate resolution 79, agreed to August 26, 1912, be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting, in line 2, page 2, of said resolution, after the word "eight," the words "November 5, 1912."

Mr. LODGE. Then it makes an additional charge on the contingent fund?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the fact that there is nothing at all in the resolution about paying the expenses. The law which has been read simply provides that certain payments shall not be made from that fund except by the authority of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Now, if the chairman of this committee can not get along without an additional act by the Senate, he can ask for it, but I can not see in the statute which has been read anything that deprives the Senate of its jurisdiction and power to pass a resolution for an investigation.

The matter of paying any expenses which may be necessary for the conduct of that investigation is a separate proposition entirely. I do not see in the statute anything that deprives the Senate of its right and jurisdiction to pass a resolution of this character or any other resolution that it sees fit to pass.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator from Virginia a question?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator think that committees can incur expenses and then come and ask that they be paid out of the contingent fund?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If they do so, they do it on their own responsibility. If a committee can not find anywhere a law to meet a necessary expense, then they can come back to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, if a committee can involve itself in expenses before receiving authority to do so, the statute is valueless; that is, if a committee can incur expense and then after incurring it simply come and get an order therefor from the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is a matter for the committee to determine.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. It leaves it to the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. But what I am insisting upon is the power of the Senate—the jurisdiction of the Senate—to pass this resolution, if it sees fit, and make no provision now for the payment of expenses.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to the fact that the resolution which is pending before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or the subcommittee, provides for the payment out of the contingent fund of the expenses of this investigation. Now, this proposed amendment which is pending is to amend that resolution so as to provide for an examination as to the election of 1912, and if that is done the same proposition will still be before the committee to pay out of the contingent fund the expenses of the investigation as to the election of 1912.

Mr. LODGE. That is precisely what I understood. It enlarges the charge on the fund.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I suspect the committee will find under the provisions of the original resolution sufficient authority to pay these expenses. If it does not, it is a problem not involved in the passage of this resolution now. It can come up later, and in some other way. What I am insisting upon is the power of the Senate to pass the resolution, if it sees fit, and make no provision, unless it sees fit to make provision, for the payment of the expenses to be incurred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the point of order is withdrawn. The statute has been read to the Senate, and it is not the province of the Chair to insist upon its consideration in the absence of objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It was exactly my contention, that the Senate had the power to dispose of the resolution as it saw fit.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Do I correctly understand that the point of order is withdrawn unconditionally?

Mr. OLIVER. I merely testified to my willingness to withdraw the point of order. I think this is rather an important question and may govern the Senate hereafter, and I think there should be a ruling upon it. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate can report to-morrow, and but little delay will occur. I think we ought to have a ruling on the question. I do not withdraw the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I simply want to say as to the point of order that, while I do not doubt the authority of the Senate to proceed in the way suggested by the Senator from Virginia, the only question is as to its advisability.

If a rule of the Senate can be broken in one proceeding, that can be cited for breaking it in another proceeding. In other words, if to further a good end we will trample upon our rules, we may very well be asked in future to do the same to accomplish a purpose that is not so clearly good.

It seems to me that this is clearly an infraction of the rule. I myself introduced a bill this morning that I think presents an analogous case. At the last session of Congress, or the one before, Congress passed a law providing for the erection of a public building in Honolulu, limiting the cost. I introduced this morning an amendment to that bill providing for an increase of the cost, and it went to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, as it properly should. This motion of the Senator from Minnesota not only amends a past action of this body, but it incurs additional expense, and in addition to that extends the jurisdiction of the committee to inquire into something to which its inquiry was not directed by the former resolution. I think we should proceed carefully.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, has the point of order been withdrawn?

Mr. OLIVER. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It occurs to me that the Senate having authorized an investigation of the campaigns of 1904 and 1908, the committee could not well expend money from the contingent fund which authorized that investigation to investigate another and altogether different campaign.

Mr. LODGE. Which had not occurred.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Which had not occurred at the time the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the original resolution provided for the expenditure of money for specific purposes; that is to say, for the investigation of expenditures for political purposes, covering certain years. The committee determined upon that resolution whether it was appropriate and expedient to expend the necessary money for that investigation. Now, we are proposing to extend the scope, covering the political expenditures during another and a different year, which would involve additional expenses. That question has never been before the Committee on Contingent Expenses at all and has never been considered.

Perhaps, if the original resolution had provided for this additional investigation the committee might have refused to approve it, for the very reason that it would involve the expenditure of a greater sum than should be paid out of the contingent fund.

This question has never been before the committee and has never been investigated. It seems to me that it is clearly within the prohibition of the statute which has been read.

Mr. WARREN rose.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I understood the President was ready to rule some time ago. I ask for the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear Senators if they desire to be heard.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I was not in my seat when the matter first came up. I have nothing to say on the merits of the case, as to whether we should go into the investigation or not, but I think it is a very unusual proceeding to provide for an expenditure from the contingent fund when there is no special authority for it except to revert to a resolution passed at another time and to say nothing of an appropriation to cover the same. The Appropriation Committee is supposed, in appropriating for the contingent fund, to have some basis or estimate or authority, the same as when appropriating for other purposes. At the present time——

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WARREN. After a moment. At the present time it may be—while that will not affect the merits of the case—that there is no money available to pay anything of consequence until we make further appropriations; and there might be the embarrassment of some vouchers of the committee being unpaid for a time, until the matter could be acted upon. I think it an unsafe way to proceed without accompanying the proposition with the necessary authority to pay, and therefore the measure ought to go to the Committee on Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and if approved by that committee the Appropriation Committees of the Senate and House would have that authority before them and would know what to provide for.

Mr. CLAPP. I want simply to remind the Senator from Wyoming—I do not know whether he was here at the time or not—that on the 24th day of August the Senate did just what they are asked now to do. They amended resolution No. 79 by resolution No. 386, covering practically all the expenses the committee incurred without submitting it to the Committee on Contingent Expenses. Pending the consideration of that resolution, that resolution itself, No. 386, was amended by inserting the words "an attorney," which would possibly materially enlarge the expenses to be incurred by the committee.

If the position taken is right, then I submit that no matter whether the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate have passed on it or not, if they have reported favorably on a resolution the Senate would be absolutely powerless to insert a word of amendment increasing possibly the expense of the investigation without sending that question of amendment back to the same committee for its action on the amendment. I do not believe the law is susceptible of any such construction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule on the question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the Chair rule on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before doing so, the Chair will direct the Secretary to read another section of the statute law, illustrative of this question rather than bearing directly on the precise point involved.

The Secretary read from the Thirty-second Statutes, page 26, as follows:

That hereafter appropriations made for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives or the Senate shall not be used for the payment of personal services, except upon the express and specific authorization of the House or Senate in whose behalf such services are rendered. Nor shall such appropriations be used for any expenses not intimately and directly connected with the routine legislative business of either House of Congress, and the accounting officers of the Treasury shall apply the provisions of this paragraph in the settlement of the accounts of expenditures from said appropriations incurred for services or materials subsequent to the approval of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will also direct that section 76 of the Revised Statutes be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 76. No payment shall be made from the contingent fund of either House of Congress unless sanctioned by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate or the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives, respectively.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In passing upon the question, the Chair, of course, can not be influenced in any degree by the question whether or not he favors the purpose of the resolution. It must be decided exclusively upon the question whether or not it is in order under the rules of the Senate and the statute law.

In the opinion of the Chair, the resolution should go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The reasons have been fully stated by several Senators, and among others the Chair desires to say that the statement made by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] in his opinion briefly and clearly expresses the necessity for a reference of the resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The original resolution was one which authorized an investigation of a certain expenditure in a certain campaign, and was limited to that campaign; that matter was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. This amendment provides for an altogether new investigation of expenditures in an altogether different campaign. In the opinion of the Chair, this amendment stands in exactly the same position before the Senate as if an independent resolution had been offered for the investigation of the expenses in the campaign of 1912. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is the morning business closed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask the Senate to resume consideration of House bill 19115, the omnibus claims bill, and I would like to have the reading of the pending amendment finished, because we have spent four days now in trying to get the amendment read. It will take only a very short time to complete the reading, and then I desire to yield to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who wishes to make some remarks.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. The Secretary will continue the reading of the pending amendment.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the amendment to the amendment on page 75, line 11, and concluded the reading.

The amendment to the amendment proposes to insert the following:

(Omit the part in brackets and insert the part printed in italic.)

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to claimants named in this act the several sums appropriated herein, the same being in full for and the receipt of the same to be taken and accepted in each case as a full and final release and discharge of their respective claims, namely:

COURT OF CLAIMS, CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, June 24, 1912.

Hon. JAMES S. SHERMAN,
President of the Senate.

SIR: Pursuant to the order of the court I transmit herewith a certified copy of the findings of fact and conclusion filed by the court in the aforesaid cause, which case was referred to this court by resolution of the United States Senate under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

ARCHIBALD HOPKINS,
Chief Clerk Court of Claims.

[Court of Claims. Congressional. No. 15002–2. Lucy May Castor, administratrix of the estate of Thomas Foster Castor, deceased, v. The United States.]

STATEMENT OF CASE.

This is a claim for longevity pay alleged to be due on account of the service of Thomas Foster Castor, late an officer in the United States Army. On the 21st day of June, 1910, the United States Senate referred to the court a bill in the following words:

"[S. 8513, Sixty-first Congress, second session.]

"A bill for the relief of John Egan and certain other Army officers and their heirs and legal representatives.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle, adjust, and pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the claims of * * * Thomas F. Castor * * *, officers of the Army of the United States, or their heirs or legal representatives where dead, for longevity pay, according to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases of the United States v. Tyler (105 U. S., 244); The United States v. Morton (112 U. S., 1); and The United States v. Watson (130 U. S., 80)."

The said Lucy May Castor appeared in this court April 20, 1911, and filed her petition, in which it is substantially averred that—

She is the administratrix of the estate of Thomas Foster Castor, who entered military service of the United States as a cadet at the Military Academy July 1, 1841, and served continuously until the date of his death, September 8, 1855; that longevity pay computed on a basis that his service began on entering said Military Academy was never paid said officer or the claimant; and that additional longevity pay should be paid the claimant reckoned on a basis that his service began on entering said Military Academy, in accordance with the decisions of the United States Supreme Court in the cases of Tyler v. United States (105 U. S., 244), of Morton v. United States (112 U. S., 1), and of United States v. Watson (130 U. S., 80); that a claim for all pay and allowances due was filed with the Auditor for the War Department and disallowed by that officer, and the claimant claimed $671.40.

The case was brought to a hearing on its merits on the 3d day of June, 1912. Frederick A. Fenning, Esq., apeared for the claimant, and the Attorney General, by George M. Anderson, Esq., his assistant and under his direction, appeared for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States.

The court, upon the evidence and after considering the briefs and arguments of counsel on both sides, makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT.

I. The claimant herein, Lucy May Castor, is a citizen of the United States, residing at Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania, and is the duly appointed administratrix of the estate of Thomas Foster Castor, deceased, who during his lifetime was an officer in the United States Army, having entered the Military Academy as a cadet July 1, 1841. He graduated therefrom and was appointed a second lieutenant, Second United States Dragoons, July 1, 1846; was promoted to first lieutenant October 9, 1851, and died September 8, 1855.

II. Said decedent was paid his first longevity ration from July 1, 1851.

Under the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of United States v. Watson (130 U. S., 80), said decedent would be entitled to additional allowances, as reported by the Auditor for the War Department, amounting to $671.40.

III. The claim was presented to the accounting officers of the Treasury and was disallowed November 12, 1890. Except as above stated, the claim was never presented to any officer or department of the Government prior to its presentation to Congress and reference to this court, as hereinbefore set forth, and no evidence is adduced showing why claimant did not earlier prosecute said claim.

CONCLUSION.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact, the court concludes that the claim herein, not having been filed for prosecution before any court within six years from the time it accrued, is barred.

The claim is an equitable one against the United States in so far as they received the benefit of the service of said decedent while a cadet at the Military Academy, which service the Supreme Court in the case of United States v. Watson (130 U. S., 80) decided was service in the Army.

Letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of William H. Conger and Mary L. Cummings, widow of Cornelius Cummings, and Mary Sullivan, widow of John Sullivan, against The United States.

COURT OF CLAIMS, CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, May 24, 1912.

Hon. JAMES S. SHERMAN,
President of the Senate.

SIR: Pursuant to the order of the court I transmit herewith a certified copy of the findings of fact and conclusion filed by the court in the aforesaid cause, which case was referred to this court by resolution of the United States Senate under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

[Court of Claims. Congressional, No. 14860. Subnumbers as below. (League Island Navy Yard, Philadelphia, Pa.) 8, William H. Conger; 29, Mary L. Cummings, widow of Cornelius Cummings; 37, Mary Sullivan, widow of John Sullivan, v. The United States.]

STATEMENT OF CASE.

This is a claim for the payment to the above-named claimants for services rendered at the League Island Navy Yard, Philadelphia, Pa., between March 21, 1878, and September 22, 1882, for extra labor above the legal day of eight hours.

On June 21, 1910, the United States Senate by resolution referred to the court, under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act, Senate bill No. 5123, which, so far as it pertains to the claims herein, reads as follows:

"A bill for the relief of William A. Ashe and others.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to * * * William H. Conger, * * * Mary L. Cummings, widow of John Cornelius Cummings; * * * Mary Sullivan, widow of John Sullivan; * * * the amounts that may be found due each of them, respectively, for extra labor above the legal day of eight hours while employed by the United States as workmen, laborers, or mechanics at the various navy yards of the United States performed by them by reason of and under the provisions of circular numbered eight, issued by the Secretary of the Navy on March twenty-first, eighteen hundred and seventy-eight."

Thereafter the claimants named above and each of them offered and filed their respective petitions herein, in which they and each of them aver substantially as follows:

That between March 21, 1878, and the 21st day of September, 1882, they and each of them were employed by the Government of the United States at the navy yard at League Island, Philadelphia, Pa.; that on the 21st day of March, 1878, the Secretary of the Navy issued the order referred to in claimants' petition, known as Circular No. 8, and set forth in Finding I here.

That during the six months in each year from the date of said order to the 21st day of September, 1882, they worked during all or a portion of the time they were so employed in excess of eight working hours per day, and that they, and each of them, were paid for only eight hours' work per day for the time they were so employed during said period, and that they, and each of them, are entitled to the amounts set forth in their respective petitions, being the pay for all time worked during said period in excess of eight hours per day.

The case was brought to a hearing on the evidence and merits May 13, 1912. Messrs. Herbert & Micou appeared for the claimants, and the Attorney General, by Percy M. Cox, Esq., his assistant and under his direction, appeared for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States.

The court, upon the evidence and after considering the briefs and arguments on both sides, makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT.

I. Between the 21st day of March, 1878, and the 22d day of September, 1882, the claimants herein, or their decedents, and each of them, were in the employ of the United States in the navy yard at League Island, Philadelphia, Pa., during which time the following order was in force:

[Circular No. 8.]

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 21, 1878.

The following is hereby substituted, to take effect from this date, for the circular of October 25, 1877, in relation to the working hours at the several navy yards and shore stations:

The working hours will be—

From March 21 to September 21, from 7 a. m. to 6 p. m.; from September 22 to March 20, from 7.40 a. m. to 4.30 p. m., with the usual intermission of one hour for dinner.

The departments will contract for the labor of mechanics, foremen, leading men, and laborers on the basis of eight hours a day. All workmen electing to labor 10 hours a day will receive a proportionate increase of their wages.

The commandants will notify the men employed, or to be employed, of these conditions, and they are at liberty to continue or accept employment under them or not.

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

II. Said claimants and each of them, or their decedents, while in the employ of the United States as aforesaid worked on the average the number of hours set opposite their respective names in excess of eight hours a day and at the wages below stated, to wit:

No. 29. Cornelius Cummings	683½ hours, at $3 per day.
No. 37. John Sullivan	238 hours, at $2 per day.
	118 hours, at 3.50 per day.
	1,063$\frac{7}{12}$ hours, at $2.50 per day.

The claimant, William Conger, was employed during said period as a messenger and does not appear to have been governed by the above circular fixing the hours of labor for mechanics, foremen, leading men, and laborers.

III. If it is considered that eight hours constituted a day's work during the period from March 21, 1878, to September 22, 1882, under said Circular No. 8, then the claimants herein have been underpaid, as follows:

Maria L. Cummings, widow of Cornelius Cummings, deceased, two hundred and fifty-six dollars and twenty-five cents ($256.25).

Mary Sullivan, widow of John Sullivan, deceased, four hundred and forty-three dollars and forty-nine cents ($443.49).

IV. The claimants' decedents, Cornelius Cummings and John Sullivan, hereinbefore named, filed their claims in this court in 1888 under No. 16327, and in 1906 same were dismissed for want of prosecution, and no reason is given why said claimants did not prosecute their said claims to a final judgment in this court.

Except as above stated the claims were never presented to any department or officer of the Government prior to the presentation to Congress as set forth in the statement of the case, and no evidence is adduced to show why they did not earlier prosecute said claims.

CONCLUSION.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact the court concludes that the claims herein are not legal ones against the United States and are equitable only in the sense that the United States received the benefit of the services of claimants' decedents in excess of eight hours a day, as above set forth.

INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF LIQUORS.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday, January 13, at 3 o'clock p. m., the bill (S. 4043) to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors be taken up for consideration, not to interfere with the impeachment proceedings if they shall not be concluded, and that the vote be taken on all amendments pending and amendments to be offered, and upon the bill itself, not later than the hour of 6 o'clock on that day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What date does the Senator from Tennessee suggest?

Mr. SANDERS. Next Monday. That is supposed to be after the impeachment trial has been concluded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There are a number of Senators who desire to be heard on the bill before it is voted on.

Mr. SANDERS. I propose that one week shall be given, and my idea is that there will be time enough for everyone to be heard between now and then.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Probably during that time there will be no opportunity at all to be heard. The impeachment trial, with which we are engaged every day, and which occupies our attention pretty fully, probably will not be concluded before that time. For the present I must object to fixing a time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah objects to fixing a time.

Mr. SANDERS. I will withdraw the request then.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to yield to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and I announce that to-morrow at the conclusion of the morning business I will ask the Senate to resume the consideration of the omnibus claims bill.

SUBMISSION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, a short time ago the legislature of one of the States sent a memorial to Congress protesting against the manner in which the Congress submitted the proposed amendment to the Constitution relative to the election of Senators by popular vote. The contention upon the part of the memorialists was to the effect that the joint resolution had not passed the Congress by a sufficient vote, or the vote required by the Constitution, and that, therefore, the States should not be called upon to vote upon the question of whether they would ratify the amendment. I want, in the very brief time which is allowed during this morning hour, to put into the RECORD some of the precedents with reference to this matter. The Constitution provides that—

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, etc.

Similar language is used in the Constitution relative to the President's veto, wherein it is stated:

If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill—

And so forth.

The specific question which is raised by the memorial is, What constitutes the "House," and what does the Constitution mean when it says "two-thirds of the House"? It is unnecessary to argue this as an original proposition, because it has been settled by a long line of precedents, all establishing one proposition, and that is, that the Constitution is satisfied in its terms when two-thirds of the vote cast favor the resolution, a quorum being present.

When the first constitutional amendment was passed by Congress there was a membership, I think, of 65 in the other House, and the resolution passed the House by a vote of 37, which was manifestly not a two-thirds vote of the membership. I do not find any discussion or debate at the time, but as a precedent it clearly established that it was regarded as sufficient that a two-thirds vote of those voting favored the resolution, a quorum being present.

The next precedent is one which was established during the administration of Mr. Buchanan, in which a proposed amendment to the Constitution passed the Senate. At that time the matter was debated, and the question was raised as to what was a compliance with the Constitution as to whether it required two-thirds of the membership or two-thirds of the vote cast, a quorum being present. It was established by an almost unanimous vote of the Senate that it was sufficient if the vote disclosed as favorable two-thirds of those voting, a quorum being present.

The next precedent was one which was established after the Civil War and at the time that the amendments which followed as a result of that war were before Congress. At that time the question was debated at some length, and again it was established as a precedent upon the part of the Senate that it did not require a two-thirds vote of the total membership, but two-thirds of those who voted, of course a quorum being present. The yeas in favor of that resolution were 39 and the nays were 13. After the vote was announced Mr. Davis said:

Mr. DAVIS. The question of order that I make is that the decision of this question has not been announced by the Chair according to the Constitution. The Chair has announced that the proposition has received the vote of two-thirds of the Senate, and therefore that it has passed. I controvert that fact. There are now 37 States in the Union. They are entitled to 74 Members of the Senate.

The President pro tempore then said:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires the Senator to understand what the Chair said in the announcement of the vote. It was that two-thirds of the Senators present had voted in the affirmative. That is the way in which it was announced by the Chair.

* * * * * * *

Mr. DAVIS. That is just as I understood it. Now, the conclusion does not follow the vote which the Chair announced, because the Senate consists of 74 Members, and to constitute two-thirds of the Senate a vote of 50 is necessary. My point of order is, that when a less number than two-thirds of the Senate is required by the Constitution for any purpose; for instance, to ratify a treaty or to confirm a nomination, the Constitution expressly says that it shall be two-thirds of the Members present. In voting upon a proposition to amend the Constitution, the Constitution does not limit the number of two-thirds by reciting that it is two-thirds of the Members present. Here is the language of the Constitution:

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary," etc.

Now, if Senators will look to that part of the Constitution which regulates the ratification of treaties by the Senate, or the confirmation of nominations to office by the President, they will perceive that the Constitution declares expressly that the two-thirds meant to effect those purposes are two-thirds of the Members present. In relation to this important matter of amending the Constitution there is no such restricted definition of two-thirds; but the Constitution in broad language provides that "Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary," etc., shall propose amendments of the Constitution. Now, the question is, What is two-thirds of both Houses?

Senator Trumbull on the same occasion said:

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Chair will indulge me a moment, this very point was raised in regard to a constitutional amendment some years ago, and the Senate decided by a vote, almost unanimously, that two-thirds of the Senators present were sufficient to carry a constitutional amendment. I think that the Presiding Officer upon reflection will recollect it. It was the constitutional amendment that was proposed before the war. I myself made the point for the purpose of having it decided, and it was decided, I think, by a nearly unanimous vote, that two-thirds of the Senators present, a quorum being present, was sufficient to carry a constitutional amendment.

The President pro tempore then ruled:

I believe it has been decided according to all the precedents.

The President pro tempore having so ruled, the resolution passed.

The same question was raised during the Speakership of Mr. Reed, at a time when a resolution similar to the resolution which is now under consideration was passed by Congress, and Speaker Reed ruled upon the question. His ruling is found in Hinds' Precedents, in volume 5, page 1010. I have not time, Mr. President, to read this decision, and I ask, therefore, to insert it in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the matter referred to will be inserted.

The matter is as follows:

The Speaker said: "The question is one that has been so often decided that it seems hardly necessary to dwell upon it. The provision of the Constitution says 'two-thirds of both Houses.' What constitutes a House? A quorum of the membership, a majority, one-half and no more. That is all that is necessary to constitute a House to do all the business that comes before the House. Among the business that comes before the House is the reconsideration of a bill which has been vetoed by the President; another is a proposed amendment to the Constitution; and the practice is uniform in both cases, that if a quorum of the House is present the House is constituted, and two-thirds of those voting are sufficient in order to accomplish the object. It has nothing to do with the question of what States are present and represented or what States are present and vote for it. It is the House of Representatives, in this instance, that votes and performs its part of the functions. If the Senate does the same thing, then the matter is submitted to the States directly, and they pass upon it. The First Congress, I think, had about 65 Members, and the first amendment that was proposed to the Constitution was voted for by 37 Members—obviously not two-thirds of the entire House. So the question seems to have been met right on the very threshold of our Government and disposed of that way."

Mr. BORAH. This question was raised at the time that the resolution under discussion passed the other House, and it is the record of the House which is involved in this memorial, and not the record in the Senate. I call attention to the record briefly. That record is found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Sixty-second Congress, second session, at page 6368; and, for the sake of brevity, I will also ask to insert that ruling in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, permission is granted.

The matter is as follows:

After the Speaker had announced the result, the following occurred:

"Mr. SISSON. Article V of the Constitution requires that two-thirds of both Houses when they deem it necessary may propose amendments to the Federal Constitution. Now, two-thirds of both Houses have not voted for this proposition. * * *

"The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be heard on the point of order. The Chair wishes to state the ruling. It has been held uniformly so far as the Chair knows that two-thirds of the House means two-thirds of those voting, a quorum being present."

Again the Speaker said:

"It has been held time out of mind that when the phrase or collocation of words 'House of Representatives' is used it means a quorum of the House; that is, 198 Members in this House. If it can do one thing with a bare quorum it can do anything."

Again, further on, the Speaker said:

"The Chair will state to the gentleman and to the House that if the question had never been raised before and Speaker Reed had never decided it the present occupant of the chair would decide it the very same way that Speaker Reed decided it. By the vote just taken the House votes to recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and to concur in the Senate amendment, two-thirds having voted therefor."

Mr. BORAH. Now, Mr. President, the language of the Constitution with reference to the vote which is required to pass a bill over the President's veto was passed upon by the Supreme Court in a case found in One hundred and forty-fourth United States Reports. The Supreme Court held in that case that "two-thirds" meant two-thirds of those voting, a quorum being present; and we will remember that the language of the Constitution is practically the same in both instances. I will also ask leave to insert in the RECORD some excerpts from that opinion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

One of the questions presented by this case was whether the act of May 9, 1890, was legally passed. This was the important question. Among other things, the court said: "The Constitution provides that a majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business. In other words, when a majority are present the House is in a position to do business. Its capacity to transact business is then established, created by the mere presence of a majority, and does not depend upon the disposition or assent or action of any single Member or fraction of the majority present. All the Constitution requires is the presence of a majority, and when that majority are present the power of the House arises. * * * The other branch of the question is whether, a quorum being present, the bill received a sufficient number of votes; and here the general rule of all parliamentary bodies is that when a quorum is present the act of a majority of a quorum is the act of the body."

Again, it is said: "If all the members of a select body or committee or if all the agents are assembled or if all have been duly notified and the minority refuses or neglects to meet with the others, a majority of those present may act, provided those present constitute a majority of the whole number. In other words, in such a case a major part of the whole is necessary to constitute a quorum, and a majority of the quorum may act. * * * For, according to the principle of all the cases referred to, a quorum possesses all the powers of the whole body, a majority of which quorum must, of course, govern."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this question as to the construction which should be placed upon the Constitution relative to the President's veto was decided by the present Speaker of the House of Representatives, Hon. CHAMP CLARK, upon the 14th day of August, 1912. The Speaker rendered an extensive opinion, and that I also ask leave to insert in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the question which was decided yesterday is of such far-reaching importance that he owes it to himself, as well as to the House and to future Speakers, to restate his opinion after an examination of the authorities. The parliamentary question in issue was this: On a roll call on passing a bill over the President's veto, in determining whether two-thirds have voted for it, should those answering "present" be taken into consideration or excluded therefrom?

The Chair has accepted the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], for whose knowledge of parliamentary law the Chair has very great respect, and that is to give a more elaborate opinion than just simply announcing a decision one way or the other. The importance of the question demanded and has received closest examination. The situation about it is this: Touching the passage of a bill over the President's veto, or the attempt to pass it, the constitutional provision is as follows:

"Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approves, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it with his objections to that House in which it shall have originated"—

In this case the House of Representatives—

"who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House it shall become a law. But in all such cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House, respectively."

The Chair could very well adopt the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as his opinion. The Chair takes it that no Speaker is ever going to render an opinion for partisan political effect which he can not stand by whenever the same kind of a question arises again, whether it goes against his political friends or foes.

The first point in the excerpt from the Constitution which attracts attention in this case is "if after reconsideration two-thirds of that House," and so forth. There have been all sorts of contentions about what constitutes "the House." Some gentlemen of eminent ability have contended it means all the Members elect and qualified; others have contended it means simply a quorum, and several decisions, not on this particular question of passing bills over the President's vetoes but on questions practically involving the same question as to the count, have been rendered, but finally it has come to be accepted that "the House" does not mean all the Members elected and qualified, but only a quorum. The full membership of the present House is 394, a quorum of which is 198; but there are four vacancies, reducing the membership to 390, of which 196 constitute a quorum. That is proposition No. 1.

The second constitutional proposition is stated in these words:

"But in all such cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by the yeas and nays—"

That is, in veto cases—

"and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House respectively."

The Chair answered the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] inadvisedly, that the names of those present ought to be in the Journal. The Constitution does not require any such thing. The Chair has investigated that matter since, and it is entirely immaterial whether the names of the 10 gentlemen who answered "present" go in the Journal or not. The Constitution does not provide for a Member voting "present," but the rules of the House, in order to eke out a quorum, have provided that they can vote "present." They have to answer "aye" or "nay" on the roll call in order to be counted on passing a bill over the President's veto. That is the requirement of the Constitution, and if the contention were on a proposition which required only a majority it would be the same way. In fact, that is one unvarying rule of procedure whenever the roll is called on any proposition. The Chair announces: "So many 'ayes,' so many 'nays,' so many 'present'; the 'ayes'—or 'nays,' as the case may be—have it." Those voting "present" are disregarded, except for the sole purpose of making a quorum.

In this case 174 Members voted "aye," 80 voted "no," and 10 answered "present"; 174 plus 80 equal 254, a quorum, without counting the 10 who answered "present." One hundred and seventy-four is more than two-thirds of 254.

These 10 gentlemen were here simply for the purpose of making a quorum. It is clear that to count them on this vote would be to count them in the negative, and the chair does not believe that any such contention as that is tenable. The Chair holds that, if there is a quorum present on a roll call to determine whether the House will agree to pass a bill over the President's veto, and two-thirds of those voting vote "yea," that is sufficient and is a compliance with the constitutional requirement.

To show that the view expressed by the Chair is correct, there is a fact dehors the record which tends to clarify the situation. Of the 10 Members who answered "present," 7 were Democrats and 3 Republicans. Of course every one of the 7 Democrats, if not paired, would have voted "aye"; so that to have counted in the 7 Democrats who answered "present" in determining the two-thirds would have put them down as voting "no," precisely opposite to the way they would have voted, which amounts to a reductio ad absurdum.

The Chair has hunted up the authorities. There are several of them, but there is no use in citing but one. I take it that political friend and foe alike will admit that when the Hon. Thomas B. Reed expressed an opinion he expressed it so one could understand what it meant, and therefore I will read section 7027, volume 5, Hinds' Precedents, and this is the headline or syllabus:

"The vote required on a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution is two-thirds of those voting, a quorum being present, and not two-thirds of the entire membership. On May 11, 1898, Mr. John B. Corliss, of Michigan, called up the joint resolution (H. Res. 5) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of Senators of the United States.

"The question being taken on the passage of the resolution, there were—yeas 184, nays 11, and the Speaker announced that the joint resolution was passed, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof.

"Mr. EBENEZER J. HILL, of Connecticut, called attention to this clause of the Constitution:

"'The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States shall call a convention for proposing amendments'; and made the point of order that the vote required was two-thirds of the entire membership, not two-thirds of a quorum.

Mr. Speaker Reed said:

"The question is one that has been so often decided that it seems hardly necessary to dwell upon it. The provision of the Constitution says 'two-thirds of both Houses.' What constitutes a House? A quorum of the membership, a majority, one-half and one more. That is all that is necessary to constitute a House to do all the business that comes before the House. Among the business that comes before the House is the reconsideration of a bill which has been vetoed by the President; another is a proposed amendment to the Constitution; and the practice is uniform in both cases that, if a quorum of the House is present, the House is constituted, and two-thirds of those voting are sufficient in order to accomplish the object. It has nothing to do with the question of what States are present and represented, or what States are present and vote for it. It is the House of Representatives in this instance that votes and performs its part of the function. If the Senate does the same thing, then the matter is submitted to the States directly, and they pass upon it.

"The First Congress, I think, had about 65 Members, and the first amendment that was proposed to the Constitution was voted for by 37 Members, obviously not two-thirds of the entire House. So the question seems to have been met right on the very threshold of our Government and disposed of in that way."

It turned out in the evolution of things that when Mr. Speaker Reed made his ruling that he had the right to count the Members who were present and who would not vote, it created a great deal of bitterness, the question finally got into the Supreme Court of the United States, and in the case of the United States v. Ballin, in One hundred and forty-fourth United States Supreme Court Reports, this question is gone into, Mr. Justice Brewer rendering the opinion of the Supreme Court. He gives a statement of the matters in controversy:

"That the Journal of the House of Representatives shows the facts attending the passage of the act of May 9, 1890, thus:

"'The Speaker laid before the House the bill of the House (H. R. 9548) providing for the classification of worsted cloths as woolens, coming over from last night as unfinished business, with the previous question, and the yeas and nays ordered.

"'The House having proceeded to the consideration, and the question being put,

"'Shall the bill pass?

"'There appeared: Yeas 138, nays 0, not voting 189.

"'The said roll call having been recapitulated, the Speaker announced, from a list noted and furnished by the Clerk, at the suggestion of the Speaker, the following-named Members as present in the Hall when their names were called and not voting, viz:

(Here follows an alphabetical list of the names of 74 Members.)

"'The Speaker thereupon stated that the said Members present and refusing to vote—74 in number—together with those recorded as voting—138 in number—showed a total of 212 Members present, constituting a quorum present to do business; and that, the yeas being 138 and the nays none, the said bill was passed.'"

Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court. He said inter alia:

"Two questions only are presented: First, was the act of May 9, 1890, legally passed; and, second, what is its meaning? The first is the important question. The enrolled bill is found in the proper office, that of the Secretary of State, authenticated and approved in the customary and legal form. There is nothing on the face of it to suggest any invalidity. Is there anything in the facts disclosed by the Journal of the House, as found by the general appraisers, which vitiates it? We are not unmindful of the general observations found in Gardner v. The Collector (6 Wall., pp. 499, 511), 'that whenever a question arises in a court of law of the existence of a statute, or of the time when a statute took effect, or of the precise terms of a statute, the judges who are called upon to decide it have a right to resort to any source of information which in its nature is capable of conveying to the judicial mind a clear and satisfactory answer to such question; always seeking first for that which in its nature is most appropriate, unless the positive law has enacted a different rule.' And we have at the present term, in the case of Field v. Clark (143 U. S., p. 649), had occasion to consider the subject of an appeal to the Journal in a disputed matter of this nature. It is unnecessary to add anything here to that general discussion. The Constitution (Art. I, sec. 5) provides that 'each House shall keep a Journal of its proceedings'; and that 'the yeas and nays of the Members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the Journal.' Assuming that by reason of this latter clause reference may be had to the Journal, to see whether the yeas and nays were ordered; and if so, what was the vote disclosed thereby; and assuming, though without deciding, that the facts which the Constitution requires to be placed on the Journal may be appealed to on the question whether a law has been legally enacted; yet, if reference may be had to such Journal, it must be assumed to speak the truth. It can not be that we can refer to the Journal for the purpose of impeaching a statute properly authenticated and approved, and then supplement and strengthen that impeachment by parol evidence that the facts stated on the Journal are not true, or that other facts existed which, if stated on the Journal, would give force to the impeachment. If it be suggested that the Speaker might have made a mistake as to some one or more of these 74 Members, or that the Clerk may have falsified the Journal in entering therein a record of their presence, it is equally possible that in reference to a roll call and the yeas and nays there should be a like mistake or falsification. The possibility of such inaccuracy or falsehood only suggests the unreliability of the evidence and the danger of appealing to it to overthrow that furnished by the bill enrolled and authenticated by the signatures of the presiding officers of the two Houses and the President of the United States. The facts, then, as appearing from this Journal, are that at the time of the roll call there were present 212 Members of the House, more than a quorum; and that 138 voted in favor of the bill, which was a majority of those present. The Constitution, in the same section, provides that 'each House may determine the rules of its proceedings.' It appears that in pursuance of this authority the House had, prior to that day, passed this as one of its rules:

"RULE XV.

"3. On the demand of any Member, or at the suggestion of the Speaker, the names of Members sufficient to make a quorum in the Hall of the House who do not vote shall be noted by the Clerk and recorded in the Journal, and reported to the Speaker with the names of the Members voting, and be counted and announced in determining the presence of a quorum to do business." (H. Jour., p. 230, Feb. 14, 1890.)

The action taken was in direct compliance with this rule. The question, therefore, is as to the validity of this rule, and not what methods the Speaker may of his own motion resort to for determining the presence of a quorum, nor what matters the Speaker or Clerk may of their own volition place upon the Journal. Neither do the advantages or disadvantages, the wisdom or folly, of such a rule present any matters for judicial consideration. With the courts the question is only one of power. The Constitution empowers each House to determine its rules of proceedings. It may not by its rules ignore constitutional restraints or violate fundamental rights, and there should be a reasonable relation between the mode or method of proceeding established by the rule and the result which is sought to be attained. But within these limitations all matters of method are open to the determination of the House, and it is no impeachment of the rule to say that some other way would be better, more accurate, or even more just. It is no objection to the validity of a rule that a different one has been prescribed and in force for a length of time. The power to make rules is not one which once exercised is exhausted. It is a continuous power, always subject to be exercised by the House, and, within the limitations suggested, absolute and beyond the challenge of any other body or tribunal.

The Constitution provides that "a majority of each (House) shall constitute a quorum to do business." In other words, when a majority are present the House is in a position to do business. Its capacity to transact business is then established, created by the mere presence of a majority, and does not depend upon the disposition or assent or action of any single Member or fraction of the majority present. All that the Constitution requires is the presence of a majority, and when that majority are present the power of the House arises.

But how shall the presence of a majority be determined? The Constitution has prescribed no method of making this determination, and it is therefore within the competency of the House to prescribe any method which shall be reasonably certain to ascertain the fact. It may prescribe answer to roll call as the only method of determination, or require the passage of Members between tellers and their count as the sole test, or the count of the Speaker or the Clerk and an announcement from the desk of the names of those who are present. Any one of these methods, it must be conceded, is reasonably certain of ascertaining the fact, and as there is no constitutional method prescribed and no constitutional inhibition of any of those and no violation of fundamental rights in any, it follows that the House may adopt either or all, or it may provide for a combination of any two of the methods. That was done by the rule in question, and all that rule attempts to do is to prescribe a method for ascertaining the presence of a majority and thus establishing the fact that the House is in a condition to transact business.

As appears from the Journal, at the time this bill passed the House there was present a majority, a quorum, and the House was authorized to transact any and all business. It was in a position to act on the bill if it desired. The other branch of the question is whether, a quorum being present, the bill received a sufficient number of votes; and here the general rule of all parliamentary bodies is that when a quorum is present the act of a majority of the quorum is the act of the body. This has been the rule for all time, except so far as in any given case the terms of the organic act under which the body is assembled have prescribed specific limitations, as, for instance, in those States where the constitution provides that a majority of all the members elected to either house shall be necessary for the passage of any bill. No such limitation is found in the Federal Constitution, and therefore the general law of such bodies obtains.

Summing up this matter, this law is found in the Secretary of State's office, properly authenticated. If we appeal to the Journal of the House, we find that a majority of its Members were present when the bill passed, a majority creating by the Constitution a quorum, with authority to act upon any measure; that the presence of that quorum was determined in accordance with a valid rule theretofore adopted by the House; and that of that quorum a majority voted in favor of the bill. It therefore legally passed the House, and the law as found in the office of the Secretary of State is beyond challenge.

Mr. BORAH. The vote to which the objection is made by the memorialists occurred in the House. By reference to the vote there it will be seen that more than a quorum was present and that there were 238 votes in favor of the amendment and 39 against it. The record with reference to the passing of this resolution for the amendment to the Constitution is clearly and unquestionably within all the precedents which have been established from the beginning of the Government. It was legally and constitutionally submitted to the States and the States have but to ratify or reject it, as in their respective judgments seems proper. There can be no technical objection to the manner of its submission fairly raised. I doubt if the submission of any amendment to the Constitution was ever submitted in accordance with the rule sought to be invoked by those who are now objecting to the manner of submission in this instance. There does not seem to be, either in reason or in precedent, any ground for the objection.

IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. BACON) having announced that the time had arrived for the consideration of the articles of impeachment against Robert W. Archbald, the respondent appeared with his counsel, Mr. Worthington, Mr. Simpson, Mr. Robert W. Archbald, jr., and Mr. Martin.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives appeared in the seats provided for them.

The Sergeant at Arms made the usual proclamation.

Mr. JONES. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Curtis	Lippitt	Smith, Ariz.
Bacon	Dillingham	Lodge	Smoot
Borah	Dixon	Myers	Stephenson
Bourne	du Pont	Nelson	Sutherland
Bradley	Fletcher	Page	Thornton
Bristow	Gallinger	Paynter	Tillman
Brown	Gore	Perkins	Townsend
Burnham	Gronna	Perky	Warren
Burton	Hitchcock	Pomerene	Watson
Chamberlain	Jones	Richardson	Williams
Clapp	Kenyon	Root	Works
Clark, Wyo.	Kern	Sanders
Cummins	La Follette	Shively

Mr. KERN. I again announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is detained at home on account of a death in his family. He is paired, I think, with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll of the Senate 50 Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is present. The Secretary will read the Journal of the last session of the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment.

The Secretary read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, January 4, 1913.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there any inaccuracies in the Journal? If not, it will stand approved.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, I should like for the witness, Mr. Tracy, to be recalled for the purpose of cross-examining him. Saturday evening he was examined touching a matter coming under his observation and knowledge as an officer of one of the departments of the Government and I desire to ask him a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The witness will be recalled.

Mr. MARTIN. The witness is not here at the present time. Is he here?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Is he here?

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. He is here.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Oh.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. He is in the Sergeant at Arms' office, I am told.

TESTIMONY OF ROBERT C. TRACY—RECALLED.

Robert C. Tracy, having been heretofore duly sworn, was examined and testified as follows:

Q. (By Mr. Manager CLAYTON.) You are the gentleman, Robert C. Tracy, who was examined here by the respondent's counsel on Saturday last, are you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You furnished a list showing the occupations of the various jury commissioners appointed by the United States courts throughout the country, and in that list I observe you put down, of the 126, if I make no mistake in the number, 19 as lawyers?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. I desire now to ask you if you can state to the Senate how many of those 19 lawyers were railroad attorneys?—A. I do not know that any of them were.

Q. What is your information on it—the same information that you had in making this list?—A. I have knowledge of only 17.

Q. And are they railroad lawyers?—A. No, sir.

Q. Seventeen of them are not railroad lawyers?—A. No, sir.

Q. You, then, have information as to how many were railroad lawyers at the time of their appointment?—A. I do not know whether those other two were or were not.

Q. But you ascertained that 17 of them were not railroad attorneys?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, you will observe that among the papers produced Saturday—and I suppose as a part of your testimony—is a letter headed "Department of Justice, United States District Court, Northern District of West Virginia, Parkersburg, October 7, 1912," addressed to the Attorney General and signed by C. B. Kefanver. The jury commissioner therein referred to is one of the two that you designate as a railroad attorney at the time of his appointment. Who was the other one?—A. I did not see that letter.

Q. You did not?—A. No, sir.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Then, Mr. President, that is all we desire to ask the witness, but we ask to put in evidence this letter dated October 3, 1911, and addressed to the Attorney General. It is written from the United States district court clerk's office, Seattle, Wash., and is signed Frank L. Crosby.

Mr. SIMPSON. I should like to see that. We do not know what it is.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. I offer that as germane to this subject, wherein they schedule the vocations of the different jury commissioners, and it is simply to account for the other one of the two lawyers who were appointed whose vocation the witness did not remember.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection the letter will be read.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. I have no further questions to ask the witness.

Mr. SIMPSON. I have one or two questions which I desire to ask after the letter has been read.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Let the letter be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[U. S. S. Exhibit 99.]

CLERK UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT,
WESTERN DISTRICT OF WASHINGTON,
Seattle, October 3, 1912.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 26th ultimo, initials E. M. K., I have the honor to advise you that Earl R. Jenner, jury commissioner for the western district of Washington (northern division), whose occupation is given as a lawyer, advises me that he is chief examiner for the Washington Title Insurance Co., also for the Seattle Trust Co. I presume these companies are likely at some time to have litigation before this court.

Mr. Jenner states to me that he wishes very much to resign from service as jury commissioner, and I have advised him to present the matter to the judge, and I presume the resignation will be accepted and some person appointed in his place.

Very respectfully,

FRANK L. CROSBY, Clerk.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. We have no further questions to ask of this witness at the present time.

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON.) What exactly do you mean by a railroad lawyer?—A. I presume a man who has something to do with railroads.

Q. Was that what you meant when you were answering Judge CLAYTON's questions on the subject?—A. I might have had that in mind.

Q. You said there were 17 of them who were not railroad lawyers. I want to know what knowledge you have on that point.—A. I received letters—or the department did, rather—from 17 clerks of courts, saying that those jury commissioners had no connection or affiliations as lawyers with railroads.

Q. Then all you know on the subject is that the clerks of courts wrote letters stating that in their opinion, or from some information they had, as the fact may be, certain jury commissioners were not connected with railroads.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you were giving simply the information thus acquired?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where are those letters, if you know? Are they all here?—A. All except two. There were 19, and I have 17 of them.

Q. Where are the others?—A. I do not know. I heard one of them read. I do not know where the others are.

Q. Is the other one the one that was attached to the record as handed in on Saturday?—A. I do not know; I do not believe so.

Q. Will you look at this one, please?—A. (After examination.) I never saw that letter until it was printed this morning; until I got the printed copy this morning. Is that the other one you have reference to?

Q. Here is a letter, dated October 7, 1912, signed by C. B. Kefaner, clerk.—A. This is one of the missing ones.

Q. This is one of the missing ones, and the one produced by Judge CLAYTON is the second missing one, is it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Will you produce those 17 letters, please?

(The witness produced the letters.)

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, we offer these letters in evidence, although we do not care to detain the Senate now for the time which would be required to read them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection they will be received and filed.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, I desire to say that I have not had an opportunity to examine those letters critically, and therefore at this time I do not make any objection. I made my objection in the beginning, and the Chair sees what this has led to. As I said on Saturday, the very gravamen of the charge is that these 17 or 19 lawyers were connected with railroads; and I suppose if the other part of the testimony is admissible this ought to go along with it.

The letters referred to are as follows:

SIR: Please advise the department at the earliest practicable date as to whether Hy. R. Gibson, jury commissioner for the eastern district of Tennessee (northern division), whose occupation is a lawyer, is regularly retained or employed by any railroad or other large corporation likely to have litigation before the court with which he is connected.

CLERK'S OFFICE, UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT,
EASTERN DISTRICT OF TENNESSEE,
Knoxville, Tenn., September 28, 1912.

The honorable the ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Pursuant to directions contained in your letter of the 26th instant, initialed "E. M. K.," as to whether I have any knowledge of the Hon. Henry R. Gibson, jury commissioner for the northern division of the eastern district of Tennessee, being regularly retained or employed by any railroad or other large corporation likely to have litigation before the court with which he is connected, I beg to report that I do not believe that Judge Gibson is regularly retained as an attorney or counselor by any individual or corporation.

I wrote you on July 27, 1912, replying to your circular No. 313, that Judge Gibson had retired from active practice of his profession as an attorney at law and that for a long term of years he was chancellor of the State court of equity at this place and was for many years Congressman from the second congressional district of Tennessee.

I think his principal occupation now is writing law books, he being the author of Gibson's Suits in Chancery, which has reached its second edition.

You are respectfully referred to rule 21 of the rules of this court relating to placing names of talesmen in the jury box by the jury commissioner, and the provisions of this rule have been embodied in a new rule recently promulgated by Judge Sanford. I beg to state, with all due respect, that Judge Sanford would not permit a practicing attorney or one retained by any individual or corporation to act as jury commissioner of any of the divisions over which he presides for a single instant.

Yours, respectfully, HORACE VAN DEVENTER, Clerk.

Mr. SIMPSON. You wanted to ask Mr. Tracy some questions, Mr. CLAYTON.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Yes.

Q. (By Mr. Manager CLAYTON.) Mr. Tracy, Mr. Simpson made some references to the way in which you got your knowledge of the vocations of these 19 lawyers, or these 17, that you say you ascertained not to have any connection or affiliation with railroads, and on Saturday you produced here this paper, marked "U. S. S. Exhibit GG." You made up that paper, and your testimony predicated upon that paper is derived from the same source of knowledge, to wit, from letters from clerks of courts, that the testimony you have given this morning is derived, is it not?—A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. That is enough.

Mr. SIMPSON. That is all.

Mr. MARTIN. We will now call Mrs. R. W. Archbald.

TESTIMONY OF ELIZABETH C. ARCHBALD.

Elizabeth C. Archbald, being duly sworn, was examined and testified as follows:

Q. (By Mr. MARTIN.) You are the wife of the respondent, Judge R. W. Archbald?—A. I am.

Q. What was your name before you were married?—A. Elizabeth Cannon.

Q. You are a relative of Henry W. Cannon, are you not?—A. I am.

Q. State what relation, please.—A. Mr. Cannon's father was my father's only brother.

Q. So that you and Mr. Henry W. Cannon are first cousins?—A. We are.

Q. How intimately have you known Mr. Henry W. Cannon?—A. We have been associated more or less all our lives; brought up together; and we have been very closely associated all our lives.

Q. Does that intimacy continue to the present time?—A. It does.

Q. Mr. Cannon generally lives in New York, does he not?—A. His home is in New York.

Q. And your home is in Scranton, Pa.?—A. Yes.

Q. Have you and Mr. Henry W. Cannon visited frequently or not?—A. We have.

Q. You at his house?—A. I have been.

Q. Have you ever taken any trips in company with him or his family, or any members of his family?—A. I have.

Q. How frequently, Mrs. Archbald?—A. Well, within the last 12 years we have been with Mr. Cannon on several excursions; four or five, I think.

Q. Prior to that time do you know anything about Mr. Cannon's business engagements, or his attention to business?—A. Not definitely. I know he was a very busy man for a great many years, 25 or 30 years; that he was very much occupied.

Q. Can you state whether or not about 10 or 12 years ago he began to release the attention to business which theretofore had occupied him?—A. He did.

Q. What trips have you taken with him in the last 10 or 12 years?—A. Do you wish the dates?

Q. No; I am not particular about the dates. Give us the incidents, if you please; the places where you went.—A. We went to Chicago and took a lake trip with him, on a lake steamer; and to Bar Harbor, on a yacht; and one summer my daughter and myself were with him on the Sound, on a houseboat.

Q. Do you mean Long Island Sound?—A. Long Island Sound. Then, I think, the next trip was the Italian journey.

Q. The Italian journey is the one you took in 1910?—A. It is.

Q. Do you remember how that trip came about?—A. Mr. Cannon had this place near Florence that he was always very anxious for me to see. He spends every spring there; he has for the last 10 or 12 years; and for a good many years we had talked of going over and visiting him there, and in 1910 the time seemed promising, and he asked us to go, and we went.

Q. How was the invitation extended?—A. To me personally.

Q. By letter or telegram?—A. By letter.

Q. I show you a letter dated March 20, 1910, and ask you if that is the letter extending the invitation to take the trip to Europe in 1910?—A. (After examining.) Yes; it is.

Q. Will you hand it to the Secretary to be marked.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Let us see it, please.

(The letter was examined by the managers on the part of the House.)

Mr. MARTIN. The managers having read the letter we now offer it in evidence and ask to have it read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[U. S. S. Exhibit JJ.]

NEW SMYRNA, FLA., March 20, 1910.

DEAR ELIZABETH: For several years I have hoped the time would come when you could go to Italy with me for a visit at my place there. I appreciate that Judge Archbald can not leave his work, and I understand that you would not wish to leave him at home; but it seems to me if he can not leave his duties he would not object to your going abroad for a short trip, provided you could take Hugh or some lady companion. If Hugh could be detached for, say, 75 to 80 days from present work, a trip to Europe would add to his knowledge. I have found it very useful for Harry. Now, I have my room on the steamer of Hamburg-American Line sailing April 16 for Cherbourg. It's a very big, modern, slow boat, with every comfort, and so large few people ever suffer illness. If you and Hugh, or any companion you select, can go with me as my guests from New York to Europe and back to New York, to be gone, say, 80 days, returning in July, it would be a great pleasure to me. We would stay a couple of days in Paris and go to Florence to my place there, and little journeys would be made in Italy. Then if you and whoever was with you wished to travel a bit before returning, it would be arranged. You need not feel any responsibility about travel. There are many things, however, that you would wish to see that I have seen or do not care to, and you would be with your companion, independent to go about and still have my place as home. If Hugh can not go, perhaps Mrs. Lathrop or one of Rob's girls might; or you may have some other friend to take with you. You can with perfect propriety ask who you choose to go as your guest and you both will be my guests. It is a simple matter. I have extended this same invitation to others, who accepted and enjoyed the trip. It's not necessary to go into details with anybody except, of course, Judge Archbald. If he could go, that would be better yet. Think this over seriously. It seems to me this is the time for you to go abroad and store away in your mind the things you will see and enjoy to remember as years go by. I have found that one can do things if they "take the time by forelock" and just do them. I shall be in New York at my house on evening of 3d April and stay there until I sail. I will write my secretary to see what can be done about rooms on the ship, so in case you can go they can be reserved. I do hope you will arrange it.

Yours, faithfully,

H. W. CANNON.

Q. (By Mr. MARTIN.) Mrs. Archbald, what was done by you with reference to the invitation thus extended?—A. I talked it over with Mr. Archbald and urged him very strongly to go. He consulted with friends in regard to his going, who urged him also, and finally he decided that he would go, and I wrote Mr. Cannon to that effect.

Q. You did not, of course, keep a copy of that letter?—A. I did not.

Q. (Producing letter.) I show you a letter dated at Cocoa, Fla., March 29, 1910, and ask you if that was the next communication which was received by you or Judge Archbald from Mr. Cannon with reference to the European trip?—A. (Examining letter.) So far as I know, it is.

(The letter was handed to the managers.)

Mr. MARTIN. We offer this letter in evidence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[U. S. S. Exhibit KK.]

COCOA, FLA., March 29, 1910.

MY DEAR JUDGE: I have yours of 25th March and sent you a telegram. I am very glad you can accept my invitation on your own account and on Elizabeth's and mine. There will be no formality. Although guests of mine, you both are expected to have a good time in your own way with freedom in all things. About clothes, I usually wear on shipboard winter flannels and outer clothing, and thick overcoat or ulster, none of them new. I find "fall underflannels" about the thing until last of May anywhere in Europe, and you will need very few thin clothes, unless the season should prove exceptional. I usually take a couple of my last-summer suits, ordinary dark suits. I wore full dress twice last season. What we call tuxedo coat is used a great deal; some wear it on shipboard, but I am old-fashioned and stick to old clothes on ship as a rule. You could use a silk hat in Paris, but it's not necessary unless you expect to pay visits of ceremony. You can always buy a hat if needed. Take all the luggage you need; it's no trouble to me.

I am leaving for New York Friday; shall arrive there Sunday afternoon. As I telegraphed you I have wired my secretary to secure stateroom for you. I shall put you both in one room and look forward with pleasure to our trip together.

Yours, very truly,

H. W. CANNON.

Q. (By Mr. MARTIN.) Mrs. Archbald, who was the person designated as Hugh in the first letter?—A. My youngest son.

Q. Who was the Miss Lathrop?—A. A cousin of mine.

Q. By the way, how old was Hugh?—A. Twenty-nine.

Q. He is the one who was referred to as the friend of Mr. Cannon's son Harry?—A. I think he must have been. I do not recall just what you refer to.

Q. I refer to a sentence in the letter of his, if I correctly remember it. Who was the Rob referred to in the letter?—A. My brother.

Q. And the girl would be one of his daughters?—A. One of his daughters.

Q. Then there was another person referred to, Miss Lathrop. Who was she?—A. My cousin.

Q. After the receipt of this letter of March 29, did you have any further correspondence with Mr. Cannon with reference to that trip?—A. I presume so, but I could not say positively. I doubtless did.

Q. (Producing letter.) I show you a letter dated April 5, 1910, and I ask if you recollect whether that was the next letter which was received by your family with reference to that trip?—A. (Examining letter.) I could not at all tell whether it was the next letter, but it was a letter that was received.

(The letter was handed to the managers.)

Mr. MARTIN. We offer this letter in evidence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[U. S. S. Exhibit LL.]

(H. W. Cannon, 10 Wall Street, New York.)

APRIL 5, 1910.

MY DEAR JUDGE: Upon returning here Sunday night from the South I found your letter of March 29, and this morning I have yours of April 4. Please say to Elizabeth that I finally received her letter in Florida just before leaving for the North, or I should have replied to it before this.

I was under the impression I had given you the name of the ship in one of my letters to you. I think you will find that her name was given in my secretary's letter to Elizabeth. The name of the ship is Kaiserin Auguste Victoria, of the Hamburg-American Line, sailing at noon on April 16. I have tickets for you both for an excellent room, No. 236, on what is known as the lower promenade deck. My room is also on the same deck. I will hand you or Elizabeth the passage tickets on Thursday or Friday, together with labels for your baggage.

I think you are wise in taking quite a full supply of clothing, and upon consideration I think it may be well for you to take a frock coat and silk hat, as very likely they may be useful. Perhaps it might be wise to put a Tuxedo suit in your steamer trunk.

In reply to your inquiry, a letter of credit issued by any of our solvent banks or trust companies or express companies will answer your purposes.

You can make arrangements to have your mail forwarded through the bank in London on which drafts are drawn on account of your letter of credit, if desired. I suggest, however, that you use my address in Florence for your family and friends. Letters addressed as follows will reach you when in Florence, and, of course, will be promptly forwarded by my people at La Doccia:

"Care of H. W. Cannon, Villa Doccia, Fiesole, Florence, Italy."

I presume you and Elizabeth will have at least two large trunks for hold of ship and two steamer trunks for your stateroom, together with other small luggage. I will send the baggage that goes into hold over to the ship on Saturday morning. The wagon will call at the Chelsea soon after 9 a. m. (about 9.15 in the morning). I suggest that you and Elizabeth arrange for a small omnibus to take your steamer trunks and luggage down and across Twenty-third Street Ferry to the Hamburg-American pier, from which the ship will leave. By this arrangement you both will be independent as to time of starting, and you can easily find your way to the stateroom. I very likely will arrive a little late, as there are sure to be matters requiring my attention just before I sail.

All the necessary arrangements on board the ship have been made for seats at table and for deck chairs. The ship is one of the largest afloat and has a great many modern conveniences. It is a slow ship in spite of its great size. Many people who are not good sailors are able to cross in this large, slow ship in great comfort.

Yours, very truly,

H. W. CANNON.

Q. (By Mr. MARTIN.) Did you make arrangements to take the trip, and did you take the trip, Mrs. Archbald?—A. I did.

Q. Do you remember the date of sailing?—A. I am afraid I can not. April 16, it strikes me.

Q. April 16, 1910?—A. 1910.

Q. You remember how long you were gone on the trip?—A. I think we came home the second week in July.

Q. Of that same year?—A. Yes.

Q. Had you ever been to Europe before?—A. I never had.

Q. Had the judge been to Europe before, to your knowledge?—A. He had not.

Q. So that this was the first trip for both of you?—A. It was.

Q. Was there any special reason why you preferred that the judge should go with you?—A. Yes.

Q. Will you tell us briefly what it was?—A. It has been very difficult for a long term of years for me to go about alone, and Mr. Archbald could, of course, be of more assistance to me and make the journey much more comfortable for me than any other person possibly could. At the same time I would be less care to Mr. Cannon.

Q. Without going into the particulars, several years ago you had quite a severe illness?—A. Yes.

Q. And since then you have more or less depended upon the ministrations of your husband, Judge Archbald?—A. Yes, I have.

Q. So that was one of the particular reasons why you preferred that he should make the trip with you, rather than other members of your family?—A. It was a very strong reason. I was very anxious that he should have the pleasure; and, of course, it added to my pleasure as well as my comfort that he should go with me.

Q. Was there anything unusual in the invitation which you accepted from Mr. Cannon?—A. There was not.

Mr. MARTIN (to the managers). Cross-examine.

Mr. Manager NORRIS. That is all.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. We have no questions to ask.

Mr. SIMPSON. Judge Archbald, will you take the stand, please?

TESTIMONY OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

Robert W. Archbald, having been duly sworn, was examined and testified as follows:

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON.) When and where were you born?—A. I was born in Carbondale City, Pa., about 16 miles from Scranton. I went to Scranton when I was a boy about 8 years old, and I have lived there ever since.

Q. When were you born?—A. I was born on the 10th of September, 1848, being now in my sixty-fifth year.

Q. When were you admitted to the bar?—A. In September, 1873.

Q. And when did you first go upon the bench?—A. I am beginning to-day my twenty-ninth year as a judge.

Q. Will you tell us, please, of what courts and what length of time in each court, very briefly?—A. I was elected to the State court as additional law judge of the forty-fifth judicial district of Pennsylvania in November, 1884, and I became president judge of that court by seniority of commission about three years afterwards. I was reelected to the same position for another term of 10 years in November, 1894, and I was serving in that capacity when the middle district of Pennsylvania was newly created, and I received the appointment of district judge of that district as a recess appointment by President McKinley in March, 1901. I was confirmed by the Senate, my name being sent in by President Roosevelt in December following, and I remained in that position until I was appointed to the Commerce Court in December, 1910, being confirmed by the Senate in January, 1911. I was sworn in on the 1st of February, 1911, and I have since been in that position.

Q. What was the size of the middle district of Pennsylvania?—A. There are 32 counties in the middle district of Pennsylvania, the majority of them taken from the western district and a few taken from the eastern district. Together they comprise probably one-half or nearly one-half in extent of the territory of the whole State.

Q. What did your family consist of at the time you were Federal judge and what were the ages of its members?—A. I had my wife and three children; My oldest son, who is here before the Senate, my daughter, and my younger son.

Q. Will you tell us just briefly what their ages were in 1901?—A. In 1901?

Q. Yes; in 1901, when you first went on the district bench, and tell us what their ages are now?—A. My oldest son was 35 and my daughter was 33, or nearly 33, and my youngest son was going on 30.

Q. When was it that they were these particular ages?—A. When I took my position as Federal judge.

Q. You mean in 1901?—A. In 1901.

Q. That is 11 years ago?—A. Yes.

Mr. SIMPSON. Your son says you are 10 years off on time, and I should judge from his looks that that is probably so. [To the witness:] How long have you known Edward J. Williams?

The WITNESS. I have known him for some time in a general way; I suppose a dozen yaers.

Q. How long prior to the time of the beginning of the negotiations for the Katydid culm dump did he come to your office?—A. Possibly beginning a couple of years before that he would come there, I should say, once in a while He might come there once in a couple of months, perhaps.

Q. And after these negotiations commenced how often would you see him?—A. He would come there as much as once a week.

Q. When did you first see the Katydid culm dump?—A. I first saw the Katydid culm dump long after these proceedings had been begun, in August of last summer.

Q. You mean August, 1912?—A. Of 1912.

Q. Will you tell us, please, as succinctly as you can, all that happened so far as you were concerned in relation to that dump?—A. Some time in the early spring of 1911 Mr. Williams came to me and spoke about this Katydid culm dump. He mentioned the fact that there was a sort of double or confused interest; that it had been made in the operations of Messrs. Robertson & Law; that Mr. Robertson and Mr. Law (Mr. Robertson succeeding to the firm) had secured title in it; that there was also a claim of title by the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., under whom Messrs. Robertson & Law had operated. He thought that Mr. Robertson would give an option upon it, and that if an option could also be secured from the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. that would unite both or all interests and the property could be sold and something made out of it. He stated that the dispute between Robertson and the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. had been submitted to counsel for the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., Mr. Willard, who is now dead, and that Mr.

Willard had sustained the claim of Mr. Robertson. He said he thought that Mr. Robertson's interest could be procured for $3,500, and an option obtained on that. Later on he informed me that Mr. Robertson was prepared to give an option for that amount verbally.

Then, the matter of securing the Hillside Coal & Iron Co.'s interest came up. I think I first talked with Capt. May over the telephone with regard to it and asked him about it. I received sufficient encouragement from him, although I can not tell exactly what he said upon that occasion, to address a letter to him. My impression is that he suggested that I should address a letter to him for the purpose of bringing the matter to a head. I accordingly did write a letter asking him whether the Hillside's interest could be purchased and at what price. That letter has been produced here and offered in evidence. I think that was not sent through the mail, but that Mr. Williams took it, and the reason of that was for the purpose of getting a speedier answer with regard to it. That is my remembrance now. In response to that letter and what immediately followed after that I do not remember with perhaps as much clearness as I ought, but I do know that I talked with Capt. May about it two or three times. I understood from him that the matter would be disposed of at a subsequent date when Mr. Richardson, the vice president of the company, was to be in Scranton and was going to look over the property. The date which he fixed came and I did not hear anything from him. I frequently met Capt. May on the streets of Scranton, because he lives within a block of where I do—above me—and goes back and forth to his business by my house. My remembrance is that I did meet him in that way and asked him about the conclusion of the matter. It dragged on, however, for some time without anything definitely being said about it.

Q. Just go on, please.—A. In July I was going down to New York. I was assigned by the chief justice to assist in the trial of criminal cases in that city, and I spent practically all of July in attendance on those duties. Mr. Williams, in talking over the submission of the question of the conflicting interests in this dump to Judge Willard had also spoken, as I remember, of the matter having been passed on to Mr. Brownell, counsel of the Erie Railroad and of the Hillside, in New York City. I had met Mr. Brownell in May of last year when there was argued before the Commerce Court what is sometimes spoken of as the Sugar Refinery case and sometimes spoken of as the Lighterage case. My remembrance is that, acting upon that idea, which Mr. Williams had stated, and the matter dragging along considerably without any definite answer from Capt. May, I concluded to see whether I could expedite in any way the disposition of the case.

Q. Before you go any further, I want to fix two items right at that point, if I can. Did you say anything to Mr. Brownell about the matter at the time you got acquainted with him in May?—A. Not at all.

Q. Did you know at that time that Mr. Willard's opinion had been passed on to Mr. Brownell?—A. I could not say. I really do not know. I think I had, because I think that was mentioned at the same time by Mr. Williams that he spoke of Judge Willard having given an opinion upon the subject.

Q. Just go on and take up the story where I interrupted you. I wanted to fix that point.—A. Mr. Robertson was getting restive. There was no definite arrangement with Mr. Robertson except verbally at that time. He had said that he would take a definite sum, but still I was anxious to have the matter brought to a head in some way. I therefore wrote to Mr. Brownell asking for an appointment in New York. That appointment was made, I think fixed by letter, for the 4th of August, that being the day I was to be in New York in attendance upon my duties in regard to the trial of the cases there. I saw Mr. Brownell upon that date at his office and I told him—if you wish me to go on——

Q. Just go right on, please.—A. I told Mr. Brownell as the reason for coming there that there was this conflict of title about the Katydid dump. Of course, I mentioned first that I had come there to see him with regard to the Katydid dump; that I had asked Capt. May whether the Hillside Co. was willing to sell its interest, and that it seemed difficult to get a response from him. I wanted to see whether the matter could be expedited in any way. I told him that I understood the diversified titles and the complicated titles or interests had been submitted not only to Judge Willard, the local counsel, but also had been submitted to him. I gave that as the reason for coming to see him. He told me that he himself had nothing to do with that, and also that it was not so about his having passed upon the title, but that the matter was to be disposed of by Mr. Richardson, the first vice president of the company, I think. I was not acquainted with Mr. Richardson. He said he would introduce me; and he did take me to and introduced me to Mr. Richardson. I then had a conversation with Mr. Richardson somewhat similar to that which I had with Mr. Brownell. I told him at the outstart that I was not there to try to do anything over Capt. May's head; that I recognized that the matter was to be disposed of by what Capt. May would recommend; that I did not come there to influence the decision with regard to it, but simply to expedite it and try to get the matter brought to a conclusion; that the matter had been brought up to Capt. May some time in March, it was then August; and that if the property was going to be disposed of I should like to know it, and if it was not going to be disposed of I should like to know it. That was the substance of the conversation that I had with Mr. Richardson.

Q. Then what happened after that in regard to the matter?—A. Mr. Richardson said, as I remember, that he would take it up again with Capt. May, and that there would be some disposition of it one way or the other. Whether I went back and thanked Mr. Brownell or whether I saw him again on that occasion I do not quite remember. I think very likely that I went back to his office and said "good day" to him, and there may have some things passed between us there. Then I went home. About three weeks after that Capt. May was going by my house. I met him. He stopped me and he said that the company had practically decided to sell their interest.

Q. Where, relatively to your house, does Capt. May live?—A. He lives a block and a half, I may say, above my house in Scranton.

Q. And does he pass your house in going to and from the railroad?—A. I think I have already stated that he frequently goes by my house; I should say every noon. I think it was about at the noon hour that I met him.

Q. Go on, then, and take the story up, please.—A. He told me that I should send Mr. Williams to him. I got hold of Mr. Williams and sent him up. Mr. Williams brought back from there the letter which has been put in evidence, in which Capt. May said he would recommend a sale at $4,500 of the interest of the Hillside.

Q. That is Exhibit No. 4, page 139. What was done after that?—A. The next thing was to get Mr. Robertson's option in proper shape so that the whole property would be within the control of Mr. Williams and myself. Mr. Williams brought Mr. Robertson to my office. I there drew up the agreement and had Mr. Robertson sign it, in which he gave an option for $3,500 on the interest of Robertson & Law in the Katydid dump. I think the option was to run for 60 days. I witnessed that option. That option is in my handwriting.

Q. What became of it after it was executed and witnessed?—A. It was given to Mr. Williams.

Q. Go on, please.—A. Well, after that came the question of disposing of the Katydid dump. The very first thing I asked Mr. Williams when he came with the Katydid dump to me was with regard to the possibility of disposing of it. I wanted to know what could be done about it. He suggested several parties who would be likely to be interested to buy. Among others, he spoke of an electric-light company in Pittston, a city about 9 miles from Scranton, and the electric railway there. He also spoke of what we know as the Laurel Line, of which Mr. Conn is the manager. The next thing, I think, he told me was that he had been to see Mr. Conn, and that he had an appointment with Mr. Conn to take him up to the Katydid culm dump, which was about a mile, I think, from a little station called Moosic, on the Laurel line. It was a hot July day—no; it must have been in September when that happened. I did not go along. He reported that he had taken Mr. Conn there; that they had had a discussion over it, and that nothing had been arrived at. Later on I saw Mr. Conn myself. He told me that Mr. Williams's ideas with regard to the value of the dump were very much exaggerated, and that he did not believe that he could make any deal or make any arrangement with Mr. Williams; that possibly he and I could talk it over with success. I then fixed a time when Mr. Williams and Mr. Conn could be together at my office. They came to my office and we discussed it. Mr. Conn said that he would not be willing to make any arrangement about buying the dump except upon a royalty basis; that he might be persuaded to do that. We talked over the question of what royalty he would be willing to pay, and I told him that I had understood that he had offered some 41 cents, I think it was, for a culm dump at Richmond Dale, that I knew of. He acknowledged that, but he stated that that was a better dump. It was finally suggested that 30 cents possibly would be what he would be willing to pay. He also said that he would recommend a cash payment on account of the royalties. The final outcome of our talk there was that I should submit a proposition to him in writing embodying our talk; and that I did. That letter, I think, has been produced here and put in evidence. I offered, then, on behalf of Mr. Williams and myself, to sell him the Katydid dump on a royalty basis of 30 cents a ton, and he was to pay down $10,000.

Q. What followed the sending of that letter?—A. I had one or two more talks with him. I forget just when. I remember, however, going to his office in the Laurel line station and talking there with him about it, when he told me that, after talking the matter over with the president, I think, of the company, he had concluded that they had got to be at some expense in connection with handling this dump and that they were not willing to pay more than 27½ cents. He thought, however, that at that figure the transaction could be put through. After talking the matter over with Mr. Williams, I saw Mr. Conn again and agreed that we would dispose of it upon that basis. Then a contract was drawn up. I drew the contract, and I think that also has been put in evidence.

Q. There is a contract here, Exhibit 22, dated —— day of December, 1911, by and between yourself and Mr. Williams and the Erie & Wyoming Valley Railroad Co. Is that the one to which you refer?—A. Yes.

Q. That is found on page 288.—A. I drew that agreement in accordance with the conversation which Mr. Conn and I had had, and involving also some details—I have not mentioned all—that were necessary in order to make a working agreement. I sent that to Mr. Conn to look over after I had drawn it up. I arranged in that agreement, as you will see, that Mr. Williams's interest should be paid to him separately and that my interest, which was one-half, should be paid to me separately. Then we met together upon the specified time, or at least I think I then notified Capt. May either by telephone or by letter—I am not sure which—with regard to this disposition. In the letter in which Capt. May said that he would recommend selling this property, or their interest, for $4,500, he had said that the purchaser must be acceptable to his company. Therefore I felt called upon, of course, to notify him to see whether the Laurel line would be acceptable. I found out from him that the company would be acceptable to him. I think Mr. Conn had also himself seen Capt. May and found that that was the case.

Then we met to close the matter at the office of Mr. Conn's attorneys, Messrs. Welles & Torrey, and also, I think, prior to that at Judge Knapp's office, Judge Knapp representing the Hillside. I guess there was where we first went before we went to Messrs. Welles & Torrey, because when we came to discuss the matter there at Judge Knapp's we found that I had relied a little too much upon things straightening themselves out in a way that they did not do. I found that all that the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. would agree to dispose of was the interest of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., and that they particularly would make no assurance with regard to the interest of the Everhart estate or the Everhart heirs. That is a very complicated matter, but if you desire me to do so I will go on and explain about it.

Mr. SIMPSON. Just let us know was that the first you knew of the complications in the title?

The WITNESS. Well, I can hardly say that was the first I knew of the complications of the title. It was the first time I realized that there were complications with regard to the Everhart interest in the title that might prevent a sale, and which eventually did prevent a sale.

Q. What did you do, if anything, in the endeavor to straighten out those complications that you then became acquainted with?—A. As I say, the Hillside would only dispose of their interest, and Messrs. Welles & Torrey immediately said that the Everhart interest was of such substance that they could not recommend a sale with that understanding unless it was taken care of in some way. There were two or three ways suggested of taking care of it, but none of them seemed to be practicable. The matter then was dropped practically for the time being in an effort to see what could be done to obtain the Everhart interest.

If I might be permitted to explain my idea about closing this matter with the Hillside and in that way getting what I thought would be a sufficient title, I would make an explanation. It involves a little law as well as some facts. I knew that this culm dump had been made from a coal property which was jointly owned, one half by the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. and the other half by parties whom I will designate for the moment as the Everhart estate, or the Everhart interests generally. The coal had been mined by the Hillside under an arrangement—I did not find out the particulars of that until we were together at Judge Knapp's office in which that was stated—and the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. had mined out, as coowner with the Everhart estate, accounting to them for their portion of the property entirely on a royalty basis, paying the Everhart people a half royalty, or a royalty on half of the quantity, whichever you please. That had been going on, as I understand, since 1874, without any definite writing or any lease. It all depended upon a letter written by Mr. Edward P. Darling, long since dead, to the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., and that letter had been lost. It is upon that insecure basis that the whole matter of the Hillside's operations rested. The Hillside, on the other hand, had undertaken to lease a part of this property with also a portion of an adjoining property, in which the Everharts had no interest, to Robertson & Law, also on a royalty basis; and Robertson & Law had paid royalty to the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., and the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. had accounted for that royalty as I understand to the Everhart people for their share. That had been going on for some time, until the breaker of Robertson & Law had burned down. The Robertson & Law had also at that time, I believe, a washery, and were washing the Katydid culm bank under a similar arrangement.

To explain a little further about the legal matter, I assumed that the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. and Messrs Robertson & Law would have a right to dispose of this dump, regardless of the Everhart interests, if they were willing to do so; that is to say, Messrs. Robertson & Law in making this culm bank could have disposed of every ton of coal in it without any further accounting than they did make to the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. under their lease arrangement; and if they could do that when the coal was being mined, as a lawyer I concluded that they could do that even though they had put it aside temporarily in this dump, if you please, until they wished to disposed of it. I understood also that Robertson & Law had never abandoned their claim there; that even after the washery which they built had burned down, they kept their scales there, and from time to time had sold off a few tons of coal. To use the expression of the law, they "kept their flag flying there" and kept their claim. It was my idea that, so far as the Everharts were concerned, Robertson & Law having accounted for what we know as the larger sizes or prepared sizes to the Everhart interest, in the mining of the coal themselves they had full liberty, authority, and legal power to dispose of this refuse dump without further accounting to them; and if they sold their interest, if they sold the dump, they sold a clear title to it, or a clear title, except so far as Robertson & Law were concerned, and that title was in the option which Mr. Robertson had signed. But Messrs. Welles & Torrey did not look at it in that way, and, as I have said, they advised Mr. Conn that he would not be secure in taking the property without some further assurance with regard to the Everhart interest. I thereupon started in to see what I could do about getting in the Everhart interest.

Q. What did you do?—A. I found that the Everhart interest was quite a complicated one. They seemed to have divided it into twenty-fourths. The interest in the property of the Hillside was twelve twenty-fourths; there were six twenty-fourths undivided belonging to the E. & G. Brooke Co., of Birdsboro, Pa., which left six twenty-fourths, five twenty-fourths of which belonged, as I now recall, to James Everhart or the James M. Everhart estate. That estate was represented by a gentleman by the name of Heckel, a witness who has been here upon the stand. The other one twenty-fourth belonged, if I get the names right, to the John T. Everhart estate, and the John T. Everhart estate was divided up into ramifications which I am not at this time able to follow; but among others was the interest of Mrs. Holden, wife of Mr. C. P. Holden, who was a witness here on Saturday. I got Mr. Heckel to come to my office and I talked with him in regard to getting that interest. I offered him $500 for the Everhart interest which he represented, and I also wrote a letter to the E. & G. Brooke Co. offering them $500 for their interest.

Q. Did you keep a copy of that letter?—A. Mr. Heckel was to write to the different parties, with whom he was in communication, to see whether they would accept that offer. Mr. Heckel was, as I assumed, the proper party to do this, because it was to him that the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. paid the royalty which was due to the Everharts, or to that portion of the Everharts that he represented, and every month he sent around the checks to the different people, and therefore knew them and was in communication with them.

Q. Were your offers accepted?—A. The offers were not accepted. The Brooke people wrote me a letter—I do not know whether or not it has been offered in evidence; I have it here—under date of December 13, 1911, in answer to my letter.

Mr. SIMPSON. I will hand the letter to Mr. Manager CLAYTON, and while the judge is looking it over I will ask the witness what happened in relation to the Brooke matter afterwards.

The WITNESS. I got another letter from them.

Q. Have you that letter with you?—A. I did not write them again, but I got a second letter from them after they had looked into the matter, and that is the letter which I now produce.

Mr. SIMPSON. I will also hand that letter to Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, I offer these letters in evidence and ask that they may be marked and read by the Secretary at this time.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. There is no objection, Mr. President.

The Secretary read the letters, marked "U. S. S. Exhibit MM" and "U. S. S. Exhibit NN," respectively, as follows:

[U. S. S. Exhibit MM.]

Hon. R. W. ARCHBALD, Scranton, Pa.

DEAR SIR: In further reply to your favor of the 12th in reference to our interest in a culm bank in the neighborhood of Dupont, Pa., beg to state that if you would make us an offer of $2,000 cash and an additional consideration of 30 cents per ton for all sizes above pea which may be discovered in washing the same would be presented to the proper parties for consideration.

Very respectfully,

E. & G. BROOKE LAND CO.,
D. OWEN BROOKE,
Assistant Treasurer.

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON.) Did any agreement follow the communications you had with the E. & G. Brooke Iron Co.?—A. I had no further communications with them, and no agreement was made. I did not pursue that. I was not prepared to pursue that until I had seen whether I could do anything with the other six twenty-fourths of the Everhart interest.

Q. Was anything done with the other six twenty-fourths interest?—A. There was nothing further done with the other six twenty-fourths interest.

Q. You have told us that Welles & Torrey had advised Mr. Conn that he could not safely make an agreement as to the Katydid culm dump unless these interests were obtained. What afterwards followed when you found that no arrangement could be made with these people?—A. I myself also felt that I would not be willing to go any further with the matter until there had been some arrangement made with the Everhart people. I did not want to sell to anybody a lawsuit, and I did not feel as though it would be treating them properly without endeavoring to make a settlement with them. These letters from the Brooke Co. were along in the middle of December. About the last of December I went South, into Florida, and was gone about a month. I came back along in the latter part of January, 1912. I do not remember just the succession of events following, but the matter lay in abeyance without anything particular being done. I had a general idea, if I may be permitted to say so, that if the Everhart interests could be taken care of, Mr. Conn would carry out his part of the arrangement for buying the dump; and along in March I went to see Mr. Conn. I think also I had been away before that, in Washington, attending some session of the Commerce Court. I went to Mr. Conn's office really to see just how the matter stood. There he showed me a letter, dated March 13, which had been written by Mr. Williams to him. I had not seen that letter. I knew nothing about the writing of that letter, and it was somewhat of a surprise to me, because apparently Mr. Williams was doing something behind my back. After talking the matter over with Mr. Conn, I said we would consider the agreement, or the tentative agreement, off, and he would not be bound by what we had said, and I did not want to be bound. That was the conclusion reached. I took back at that time the proposed agreement which I had drawn up along in November.

Q. I notice that that agreement recites it is between Mr. Williams and yourself and the Erie & Wyoming Valley Railroad Co. Mr. Conn testified that was a mistake in the title; that it was the Lackawanna & Wyoming Valley?—A. Yes; that certainly was a mistake in the title. In the hurry of preparing it I confused the name of the Laurel line, which I am not quite sure of now, because we all speak of it by that term, with another railroad there which is called the Erie & Wyoming, which was pretty nearly on the same parallel with the Laurel line.

Q. Was anything ever done with Mr. Conn in regard to the matter after the interviews about which you have testified?—A. No.

Q. Now, there appears in evidence here an option dated April 6, 1912, Exhibit 26, page 357, given to Thomas Jones—an option on the Katydid culm dump for 10 days for $25,000. What knowledge have you in regard to that option?—A. I drew that option; at least I dictated that option to my stenographer in my office. Mr. Williams brought Mr. Jones to my office. The talk between him and Mr. Jones and me there was that Mr. Jones would like the property and was willing to take the risk of the title. That was the particular point, and that is the reason why the option was framed in the particular form in which it was framed. On the 1st of April the anthracite coal miners went on a suspension, coal began to be very scarce, and there was a good deal of scurrying around to get hold of such things as these culm dumps. I knew of Mr. Jones being active in the sale and disposition of such dumps. I also had heard of others, so that I realized somewhat how Mr. Jones came to be there upon that errand. The price was discussed between us. I think Mr. Jones came in twice. I think he had been in my office a few days before this option was drawn and that a price was talked over of $23,000, but when the option was drawn it was fixed at $25,000. In order to meet the Everhart interest, which, as I say, I felt ought to be protected in some way, Mr. Jones advanced the idea that he would put one-quarter of the purchase price in the bank to the credit of the Everharts, and in case they established their title to it it would go to them. That was one suggestion made. I think after considering that I was not willing, I did not feel as though that would be the way to dispose of it, and therefore the final arrangement was that Mr. Jones in this option was simply to get the interest or the title that Mr. Williams had by virtue of the two options which he held; and you will see, if you will examine it, as I remember it, that the option is framed with that distinctly in view—that he was to take the risk as to anything and to get in the Everhart interest if that became necessary.

Q. At the time that option to Jones was dictated who was present?—A. When we had talked over the form of the option I called in my stenographer, by a bell call, and she came in and I dictated it. Whether Mr. Jones and Mr. Williams were present during the immediate time it was being dictated I do not know. Very possibly they went out into the hall or the corridor adjoining my office and were there. I could not say about that. I have no remembrance about it. It is very possible; it is very likely.

Q. After the option was drawn what was done with it?—A. It was read over and Mr. Williams signed it, and, as I say, it was put in the particular form—I did not join in that option——

Q. I understand that. Go on.—A. I did not join in that option, because the understanding with Mr. Jones was it was simply what Mr. Williams had said that he took.

Q. And what was done with the paper itself after its execution?—A. It was delivered to Mr. Jones.

Q. What became of it afterwards?—A. I never heard, except in the most general way. I did not hear it was accepted. Almost immediately following that I was called down here to attend a session of the Commerce Court, and was here for some 10 days, I should say, in attendance upon the court. I think I came down here on the 8th of April and that I did not get back home, in Scranton, until about the 20th.

Q. Who was with you down here during that time?—A. Mrs. Archbald was with me all the time except the first two days.

Q. And you stopped at what hotel?—A. I stopped the first two days, when I was by myself, at the Hamilton Hotel. When she came we took rooms at the Grafton.

Q. What knowledge had you of the attempt to sell the dump to Mr. Bradley?—A. I had no knowledge whatever. I never had seen Bradley. I knew him by name, because he has been successful in culm dumps and because of his success in handling them that way, but I never had seen him, and I never heard of the proposed sale to him until that was brought out in the hearings in May before the Judiciary Committee.

Q. Then I may assume, may I, that you knew nothing of the letters and draft of agreement, and so on?—A. Absolutely nothing.

Q. And I may assume, also, that you knew nothing of Capt. May's recalling that agreement and the memorandum he made in regard to it?—A. Absolutely nothing.

Q. What knowledge had you of the visit of Mr. Holden to Capt. May on April 11, 1912?—A. None whatever.

Q. And what knowledge had you of the notice given by Mr. Holden and Mr. Heckle and Mr. Bevan to Capt. May and to Robertson & Law?—A. I never heard of it until it was brought out in the hearings before the Judiciary Committee.

Q. And is that true, also, of the notices given by Mr. Saltonstall and Mr. Rice Taylor?—A. It is.

Q. Mr. Williams testified that he wanted to sell the dump to Bradley, but that you did not, because you thought you could get more for it later on. What is the fact in regard to that?—A. The only thing I can think of that that may possibly refer to is this: I should say that happened some time this summer. I remember that Mr. Bradley and Mr. Williams came to my office some time along during the summer.

Q. Of what year?—A. Of 1912. I should say along in July. Of course that was after the hearings before the committee had been completed. That was the first time I had seen Mr. Bradley in Scranton. I had seen him, of course, when he was testifying here before the Judiciary Committee. Mr. Williams brought Mr. Bradley there and the suggestion was made that Mr. Bradley would buy the property, and I deprecated that, because it could not be done unless the Everhart interest was taken care of, and that interest had not yet been obtained. And I told Mr. Williams at that time that there would be no loss upon it, because the values of these culm dumps were not depreciating and might possibly be more if he waited than they were at that time. I think that is the only explanation I can give.

Q. What knowledge had you of the value of the Katydid culm dump?—A. Personally I had none. I knew in a general way what section of the country it was, because I am pretty well familiar with the surroundings; but I actually never had seen it, and found that it really was located somewhat differently from what I had supposed. I am no expert on culm dumps. I had no idea what the value was. I got my idea only from what others said about it.

Q. You said you did not see the dump itself until the summer of 1912?—A. Until some time in August, the latter part of August, of this last year.

Q. That was when this matter was pending before the Senate?—A. After the present articles had been preferred to the Senate.

Q. Then I will ask what knowledge you had, if any, as to the quantity or quality of the coal in the dump prior to that visit?—A. I had no actual knowledge. Of course, the matter had been discussed as to how much there was in the dump. I had talked that over with Mr. Conn, and Mr. Conn had told me what estimates he had and what he believed there was in the dump. My remembrance is that he spoke of something like forty-five thousand to fifty thousand.

Q. Was that during the conversations when you were endeavoring to sell it to the Laurel line?—A. Yes.

Q. That was the first knowledge you had of any figures in regard to it?—A. I will not say that, because Mr. Williams had talked about it. Mr. Williams had a very much larger idea about it, but I learned from Mr. Conn, and I think also from Mr. Williams, that Mr. Williams had tried to persuade Mr. Conn that there was very much more in there than Mr. Conn was willing to believe, and tried to get Mr. Conn to make a cash offer, first wanting him to pay $25,000 for it and subsequently coming down to $18,000, without Mr. Conn being willing to close it.

Q. It has been testified here that at some time prior to the visit you made to Mr. Richardson in New York Mr. Richardson had concluded that he would not sell the culm dump. What knowledge had you of that?—A. I had not any knowledge of that. I had not heard definitely what the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. were willing to do about it.

Q. Did you have any further communication with either Mr. Brownell or Mr. Richardson after that interview of August 4, 1911?—A. None whatever.

Q. What knowledge had either May or Richardson or Brownell as to your interest in the purchase of the dump?—A. In my very first letter to Capt. May, I addressed him in my own name, asking him to fix a price. I spoke to Mr. Brownell and Mr. Richardson in regard to the matter in a way that they must have known that I was interested, because I told, for instance, Mr. Brownell, that I was trying to get the conflicting interests together, and in that way avoid any question or controversy between the Hillside and Mr. Robertson.

Q. It appears in evidence here that at some time after the giving of the option by Mr. Robertson to Mr. Williams that option was recorded. What knowledge had you on that point?—A. I had none. It was absurd to record that, because the recording was only good as to the grantor in such a matter as that, and the grantor did not acknowledge it. It was acknowledged by the grantee. It was not acknowledged by Mr. Robertson, but somebody had procured Mr. Williams to acknowledge it and put it on record. That amounted to nothing.

Q. There has been offered in evidence a paper marked "Exhibit No. 7," page 157, which we have spoken of as the silent-party paper, dated September 5, 1911, and executed by Mr. Williams, in which he purports to assign to "William P. Boland and a silent party, whose name for the present is only known to Edward J. Williams, W. P. Boland, John M. Robertson, and Capt. W. A. May," a two-thirds interest in the Katydid culm dump. Will you please tell us what knowledge you had of the paper?—A. I never heard of that paper until it was produced before the Judiciary Committee. I would not have submitted to any such paper being drawn if I had had any notice of it.

Q. What knowledge had you of any claim of W. P. Boland to it at any time?—A. Mr. Boland's name was mentioned in this way by Mr. Williams, at the first part: He said Mr. Boland could sell—as I said a few moments ago—I had asked as to the ability to dispose of this, and Mr. Williams, among other things, said that Mr. Boland would be able to dispose of it. I did not know what interest he was going to give Mr. Boland for that. I did not know whether he was going to give him any interest.

Q. Will you tell us, please, whether then, or at any other time, you concealed or asked anybody else to conceal or knew of any attempt to conceal your interest in this matter?—A. On the contrary, I appeared very prominently in it, and I know it was known that I had an interest, because several parties, independently of those whom I have mentioned, came to me to see whether they could get this property. Among others there comes to me now a man by the name of Col. Keck, who lives at Wilkes-Barre.

Q. You did not quite answer the question, I think, or perhaps you did—whether you made any attempt or was any party to any attempt to conceal?—A. Certainly not; certainly not.

Q. In the course of your general narrative, I think you failed to refer to a letter of September 20, 1911, marked "Exhibit No. 10," page 184, in which you introduced Mr. Williams to Mr. Conn. Do you remember the giving of that letter?—A. I do not remember particularly about that letter; but undoubtedly I wrote it, so as to have Mr. Williams speak with Mr. Conn; and I think it was in consequence of that letter that Mr. Conn went with Mr. Williams to look at the dump which I had spoken of.

Q. You spoke of an interview in Scranton with Welles & Torrey and with Judge Knapp. You mean Judge Knapp, of Scranton, and not Judge Knapp, of the Commerce Court?—A. Yes; Henry A. Knapp, of Scranton. He is one of the firm of Warren, Knapp & O'Malley.

Q. Is that the gentleman who testified here? I do not mean Judge Martin Knapp, of the Commerce Court, but the member of the firm of Warren, Knapp & O'Malley who testified here?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When and from whom did you first learn that an investigation or examination was being made in regard to your conduct in relation to these various matters?—A. I learned that in this way: A lawyer by the name of John F. Scragg, who lives about a block above me, whom I have known a long while, came to me one evening and told me that complaint had been made by Mr. Boland to the Interstate Commerce Commission in regard to the disposition of the Marian Coal Co. matter. That was early in March, 1912. I was very much surprised at the matter, and he told me a good many things in connection with it. If you want me to go into it in detail, I will be very glad to do so. Among other things he said, referring to the attempted settlement, which I presume you will ask me about in a few minutes, of the Marian Coal Co.'s affairs with the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western, that it had been advanced by Mr. Boland and, I believe, also by his attorney, Mr. Harry C. Reynolds, that that was a scheme on my part to carry the matter along; that it was not undertaken in good faith, and that it was merely for the purpose of enabling the proceedings which were pending in the court by Mr. Peale against the Marian Coal Co. to come to a head and ruin that company in the interest of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad or Mr. Peale, and that——

Q. Well, was there any truth in those statements?—A. Oh, absolutely none. As I say, Mr. Scragg went into a great many details of that kind. He suggested that Mr. C. G. Boland was somewhat disturbed over it, this complaint having been made by his brother, and he also told me that Mr. W. P. Boland had sent for Mr. Williams and got him down and taken him before the Attorney General and taken Mr. Williams's statement in regard to the sale or attempted sale of the Katydid dump. I can hardly remember at this time, but he said that the Department of Justice were going to send up two detectives; he said—he called them that—that they were coming to Scranton to investigate the matter.

Q. It has been suggested here that the attempts to sell the Katydid culm dump ceased because of that investigation. What is the fact in regard to that matter?—A. There is no connection whatever with that.

Q. Why did the attempt cease?—A. Simply because the Everhart interests were outstanding, and, as I said before, I was not willing to participate in any disposition of the property which left them out.

Q. When did you first learn that Mr. Williams was coming to you and getting you to give letters and papers, and so on, at the suggestion of W. P. Boland?—A. When it came out in the hearing before the Judiciary Committee.

Q. Mr. Williams testified that at some one interview in your office he saw a brief or trial list or some paper there which had the word "lighterage" on it, and that he had a conversation with you in regard to it. Will you tell us, please, what paper, if any, he saw with that word on it?—A. There is no paper that I ever had in my office that had the word "lighterage" on it except one. If I may have my papers here I would show that one. That [exhibiting] is an argument list which was sent out for the October term of the Commerce Court.

Q. About when was that received by you?—A. I should say along about the middle of September, 1911.

Q. Did you have any conversation with Mr. Williams in relation to lighterage at all?—A. I do not remember any. I do not see how I could. I find, I might say, on that argument list in an obscure place the word "lighterage." It is on page 12.

Q. That is the same book or a copy of the same book, is it not, that was produced in evidence on behalf of the managers?—A. It is a copy of the same book except that this has my memoranda in it. I used that at the time of the argument in the Commerce Court in October.

Mr. Manager STERLING. Is that the October calendar?

Mr. SIMPSON. Yes. I think the same as you have produced. I do not think we need offer it in evidence.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Have it marked for identification, at least.

Mr. SIMPSON. I will ask the Secretary to mark it, then, please. At the suggestion of my colleagues I will offer it in evidence, but not ask to have it printed or read, though we may use it in argument.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. That is agreed to, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be marked as suggested but not printed.

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON.) It is also claimed that on some occasion or other you said to Mr. Williams that you might do harm to some officials of the Erie Railroad Co. if what you desired done was not done. Will you tell us please whether any such conversation took place; and if so, what was said?—A. Impossible; absolutely not; there could not have been such a thing; I would never have thought of such a thing.

Q. It also appears in the examination of Mr. Williams at the time he was subpœnaed to appear before the Judiciary Committee of the House that you purchased his ticket to enable him to come down here. Please tell us the circumstances appertaining to that.—A. Mr. Williams came to my office, I think it was Monday morning, and showed me a subpœna. He had already been subpœnaed to come down here. That was the first I knew as to the starting of the hearings before the Judiciary Committee. He told me that he had absolutely no money. I knew he was in that condition as a rule. He wanted me to let him have enough money to take him down here. I told him I could not do that, but I further said to him that I would have to go down to Washington at once, and based upon that information I immediately formed the determination to go on the noon train, what we know as the noon train, leaving Scranton at 12.40. I told him if he would be at that train I would buy a ticket for him, and I did—down and back.

Q. Who brought the attention of the Judiciary Committee to that fact?—A. I stated that to Mr. Worthington and Mr. Worthington told the Judiciary Committee that fact. I might say——

Q. Go on, please, if there is anything else.—A. Well, I do not know whether your question involved that inquiry, but I wanted to say that I did not feel as though I wanted Mr. Williams to be put in the position of not going. I did not know but that an attachment would come out for him, as it probably would if he did not go. He is an old man, and I have sufficient respect for him——

Q. What did you tell him?—A. I told him I would buy the ticket and I did buy the ticket.

Q. What did you tell him regarding his testimony, if anything?—A. Oh, I said, "Edward, go down there and tell the truth. That is all there is to it."

Q. In testifying regarding the interview you had with Mr. Brownell and Mr. Richardson, you said after you left Mr. Richardson's office you might have gone back to Mr. Brownell and said something to him. Have you any recollection of having gone back or having said anything?—A. No clear recollection; no.

Q. Why did you get back the contract that was drawn, to be executed between Mr. Williams and yourself and Mr. Conn in relation to the Katydid dump?—A. Because we both declared the deal off.

Q. That was the only reason?—A. That was the only reason.

Q. The article we are now considering charges that you used your influence as a judge to obtain that Katydid culm dump. Will you tell us, please, what the fact is in regard to that?—A. That is absolutely untrue, if I may so speak. I used no influence nor did I endeavor to use any influence. I had no idea it would make any difference. I do not believe it did.

Q. The people to whom you spoke are the only ones who could tell about that. Did you use or attempt to use corruptly any influence in regard to the matter?—A. As I have already said, when I went to see Mr. Richardson I told him——

Mr. Manager STERLING. Mr. President, we object to this line of testimony for the reason that it is a conclusion. It is a conclusion the Senate must draw from the facts in the case, and for that reason it is not competent for the witness to draw the conclusion. Therefore we object to that line of testimony.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I submit, Mr. President, that it is one thing that only this witness can testify to, and that is the most important thing in this whole case, and that is, what was his intent in the matter—what was going on in his mind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The witness can testify to any affirmative acts on his part.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I desire to say that Mr. Worthington raises still a further question. We objected to this witness making these statements because they constitute a conclusion drawn by the witness. Mr. Worthington makes the point that he can testify as to his intent. We want to object to testimony along that line, too.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has not been considered in ruling on the present point. The view of the Chair is that the testimony of the witness will not militate against the consideration of the contention of the managers as to what are proofs of a purpose of that kind. At the same time the respondent is entitled to negative the suggestion of any act on his part. It does not necessarily refer to the act which has been proven. It would go still further and would be a denial by him of any affirmative act on his part to accomplish that end.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I think there is a different understanding between the President and myself as to what the witness has said. The witness said he did not believe that he influenced him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the question to be whether the witness had attempted to influence him. The Chair may be in error in that regard.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I should like to have that part of the answer read.

The Reporter read as follows:

Q. The article we are now considering charges that you used your influence as a judge to obtain that Katydid culm dump. Will you tell us, please, what the fact is in regard to that?—A. That is absolutely untrue, if I may so speak. I used no influence, nor did I endeavor to use any influence. I had no idea it would make any difference. I do not believe it did.

Q. The people to whom you spoke are the only ones who could tell about that. Did you use or attempt to use corruptly any influence in regard to the matter?—A. As I have already said, when I went to see Mr. Richardson I told him——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The last part of it the Chair does not think is legitimate.

Mr. SIMPSON. I interrupted him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is excluded.

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON.) Returning, Judge Archbald, to the second article of impeachment, will you state to the Senate, please, your knowledge of and your connection with the attempt to settle the dispute between the Marian Coal Co. and the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co.?—A. That came about entirely in this way: Some time early in August of 1911 Mr. George M. Watson, an attorney of Scranton, came to me and said that he had been employed to settle the pending difficulties between the Marian Coal Co. and the Delaware, Lackawanna &

Western Railroad. He said that the time seemed opportune, because, as he understood it, the testimony had closed, or the last taking of testimony in that case, some time in the spring, and there had been a suggestion of a possible settlement, and he wanted to know whether I was acquainted with Mr. E. E. Loomis, first vice president of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad. I told him that I was. He then asked me if I would see Mr. Loomis and suggest to him that if he, Mr. Loomis, would call on him, Watson, the case could be settled. He said that he wanted me to do this in order to make a favorable introduction of him to Mr. Loomis, and it was only upon that basis that I undertook to do what I did.

Q. Go right on, please, with the story.—A. I had occasion after that, within a day or two, to go to New York. It was on the concluding day that I was there in connection with my holding of court in that city that I went to see Mr. Loomis at the office of the D., L. & W. Railroad Co. Mr. Loomis formerly lived and was connected with the Lackawanna Railroad Co. as an official in Scranton. I knew him personally and socially as well as officially. I went to him and asked him whether he would care to settle the troubles that they had with the Marian Coal Co. He immediately began to rehearse those troubles to me, and I, after listening to him a little, told him the more he talked about it the more it seemed to me a very good thing if the difficulties could be settled, and that all I came there to suggest was that I understood Mr. George M. Watson, an attorney of Scranton, had been retained by the Bolands to try and effect the settlement, and if he would call on Mr. Watson or send for Mr. Watson they could talk it over. That was all that was said, and I left his office.

Q. Just go on and take up the narrative from that point to the end. Give us a full history of it chronologically.—A. I heard nothing more for, I should say, something like three weeks, when Mr. Watson came to me one day and asked me whether I had done as I said I would. I told him I certainly had; that I had seen Mr. Loomis and given his name, and I understood from Mr. Loomis he was going to send for him, Watson. Mr. Watson said he had not done so, and that the Bolands were very anxious to have him do something, and he wanted to know whether I would not undertake to see Mr. Loomis again. I was somewhat reluctant about it, but I told him that I would. I found out that Mr. Loomis was to be in Scranton on one of his regular visits of business of the company that day. I called up his office in the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western station, and I finally, through that telephone communication, obtained an appointment with Mr. Loomis at the Scranton Club that evening. I went and saw him there and had a somewhat similar talk, perhaps a little more extended with him than I had the first time, but in purport the same. He said he was rather surprised that Mr. Watson had not been spoken to, because he had given directions to that effect, and he said that he would see that Mr. Watson was notified.

Q. Go right on.—A. Well, I really do not know exactly the next step in the matter, but I think it came about that Mr. C. G. Boland came to see me. I had known Mr. Boland 30 or 40 years; I can not tell just how long. I knew him familiarly enough to speak of him by his name. People call him "Christy." I talked with him in a friendly and familiar way every time we met. He came to me in my office on one occasion (I can not fix the exact date; I have no means of doing it) and told me about this settlement. He said that the matter was preying on the mind of his brother, W. P. Boland, and he expected if it went on further that it would end in his brother going to an asylum. My impression is that tears came to his eyes, and he drew upon my sympathy in that way by what he said and in his appearance. He asked and spoke about this settlement, and wanted me to see what I could do with regard to it. He came two or three other times in a similar way at a later date. I can not fix the time when that occurred. The next thing I think I did was a letter that I wrote to Mr. Loomis. That I did at the instance of Mr. Watson particularly, in which I suggested an interview with Mr. Watson. Perhaps I am not clear about that or about those letters.

Q. Go right on, as you now recall it, and give us the story in chronological order up to the end, and then I will fill in the gaps, perhaps.—A. I came down here to Washington. My duties as judge of the Commerce Court called upon me to do that. I was here from the very first day of October until the very last day of October. I remember distinctly that just before I came the interview that Col. Phillips has testified to.

Q. You testify to it. Let us get your version of it.—A. I wanted to see Col. Phillips about the matter. I think it was either through Mr. Watson or Mr. Boland; I can not tell you which now.

Q. You mean C. G. Boland?—A. Yes; C. G. Boland. I never had anything to do with Mr. W. P. Boland. Mr. Phillips was to see me Saturday morning. Saturday morning I got a telephone communication that he would see me Saturday afternoon. I told him Saturday afternoon was my holiday, and that I could not see him then; so an appointment was made to see me at my house in the evening. He came to my house and we discussed the matter there. He did most of the talking. His suggestion was that there was no chance, as I remember about it—no hope of settlement—because the ideas of the Bolands were very high as to the value of the thing, and the idea of the company was that they did not have very much to dispose of. The next thing that occurred, I think, was when I wrote a letter, after coming down to Washington, to Mr. Loomis, which was suggested, at the request of Mr. Watson, asking for an interview, that there might be another interview in which Mr. Truesdale as well as Mr. Loomis would be present. I learned afterwards that that interview took place. Then I got the telegram from Mr. Watson saying he wanted to see me and asking when he could see me down here. I made the answer, which has been put in evidence, that he could see me at almost any time. A subsequent telegram advised me that he was going to be at the Raleigh. I went to the Raleigh that Saturday afternoon between 1 and 2 o'clock and saw him there. We talked for a while there and then went up to my office in the Commerce Court chamber. We talked there all the afternoon. He suggested as a reason for his coming down that the Bolands wanted him to come. They wanted him to come and see me and see whether something additional could not be done to that which had been done about settling this case. I did not have anything to suggest and did not suggest anything. He also wanted a copy of the record in the Meeker case—the case brought by Mr. Meeker against the Lehigh Valley Railroad with regard to coal rates there and similar points to that from which the Marian Coal Co. were shipping their coal. I got him that record so far as it was then on file. I subsequently secured for him the briefs which were filed and sent them to him. A friendly intercourse with a party such as he was, from Scranton, consumed the afternoon. I also took him and introduced him to some of the judges of the Commerce Court.

Q. What happened in relation to this question of settlement after that date?—A. As I said a few minutes ago, I was here until the last of October, and then I went back to Scranton. Then Mr. Boland came to me and talked with me about seeing Mr. Loomis again, and I made an appointment with Mr. Loomis and saw him along, I think, about the middle of November, and to see whether the D., L. & W. Co. would make any definite offer of any kind, small or large, so as to see whether there was any prospect or hope that the parties could get together. The talk of Mr. Loomis at that time as of Mr. Phillips in his interview with me was that there was nothing of value that the D., L. & W. Co. wished to take over.

Q. Did you communicate that fact to Mr. C. G. Boland?—A. I communicated that fact to Mr. Boland, in the letter which I produced at the hearing before the Judiciary Committee and which has been put in evidence here, I think it is of the 13th of November, in which I spoke of him as "Dear Christy."

Q. You returned to him, I think your letter says, certain papers. What were those papers?—A. For the use of Mr. Watson, as I understood it, in trying to make the negotiations with the D., L. & W. Railroad Co., a statement had been made up by the Bolands with regard to their claim. Mr. Watson wanted me to look over that and see what I thought of it. I did not look it over until after I had come back from the session of the Commerce Court in October, and I did then look it over just prior to my seeing Mr. Loomis. In that statement there were three things in particular that I remember now. I can not give you a great number of details about it, but I remember the aggregate amount of that statement and somewhat how it was made up. I remember that the aggregate amount of that claim was something over $160,000, and that one item of that claim was the so-called shipping claim for moving a certain part of the coal from the line of the D., L. & W. to some other road. I was quite surprised, and that is what called my attention to it, that that claim was so small, because I understood that it was of considerable magnitude; while there was 30 cents a ton switching charge, it was only for a few thousand tons and only amounted to three or four thousand dollars. But the particular thing that impressed itself upon me as I looked upon that statement was the fact that the aggregate was made up by taking the total tonnage that had been shipped by the Marian Coal Co. and multiplying it by an alleged excess charge of some forty-odd cents, and that with the small amount of the switching charge amounted to this aggregate of something over $160,000. The excess rate was something over 40 cents.

Q. Forty cents a ton, you mean?—A. Forty cents a ton. In the hearing before the Commerce Court, the hearing of the Meeker case, the reduction by the Interstate Commerce Commission in favor of Mr. Meeker on coal shipped of similar character a similar distance to tidewater was 10, and I think in some instances 15, cents. The disparity between that which they had allowed to Mr. Meeker and that which was claimed on behalf of the Marian Coal Co. struck me at once and seemed to me to make the claim of the Bolands impossible of being supported. Those three things—the aggregate amount, the small amount of shipping charge, and the large amount as it seemed to me at the time of the excess claim of rate—were the three things that impressed themselves upon my mind and made me feel that the parties were too wide apart to ever get together.

Q. And that paper showing this data as you have given it to us was sent with your letter of November 13, 1911, back to Mr. C. G. Boland, was it?—A. It was.

Q. Did you ever see those papers afterwards?—A. Never.

Q. You have told us how long you had known Mr. Boland. Will you tell us, please, how long and how well you had known Mr. Watson at the time of this negotiation?—A. I had known Mr. Watson for about 30 years, and I esteem him exceedingly. He has come up from very humble beginnings in a way, of good family, but originally having to support himself at his trade as a carpenter. Subsequently he was a constable there in Scranton. Then he studied law, and he went on so that he became city solicitor of the city of Scranton. Later on he was nominated at the primaries and ran for judge of the county upon the death of Judge Gunston, one of my associates, and while he did not succeed, he made a very creditable showing. He is now county solicitor. As I said, Mr. Watson was an aspirant for the position which I subsequently filled when the district was created.

Mr. Manager STERLING. Mr. President, I do not like to object so often, but certainly this is improper evidence. I do not understand that it is the province of the respondent to give a good character to the men who testify in his behalf.

Mr. SIMPSON. I have not asked any questions of that kind. That is not one of the points in my question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to counsel that under the peculiar circumstances, the witness testifying in his own behalf, his own counsel ought to guide him as to matters where he is disposed to go beyond a proper point, and not leave it to the managers to object.

Mr. SIMPSON. I asked a perfectly proper question and no objection was made to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not criticizing the question at all.

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON.) There appears in evidence as Exhibit 32, page 397, a paper signed by the Marian Coal Co., W. P. Boland, president, directed to C. G. Boland, dated August 23, 1911, in which the Marian Coal Co. agrees to pay to Mr. Watson $5,000 if a satisfactory settlement is made of their claim against the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. Will you tell us, please, what knowledge you have of that paper?—A. I never heard of that paper until it was produced at the hearing before the Judiciary Committee.

Q. It was testified here that that paper was prepared as the result of an interview in your office at which you and Mr. C. G. Boland and Mr. Watson were present. Will you tell us, please, what the fact about that is?—A. It was not prepared in that way. I never heard of it, as I said. It is a letter, as I understand it, addressed by one Boland to the other.

Q. Yes; it is so addressed, I think; but do not go into that. You have no knowledge of it or of the intention to prepare such a paper? Is that correct?—A. Never.

Q. What knowledge had you of Mr. Watson's claim to $161,000 as a settlement?—A. I knew that that was the claim that he was to make to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Co., and I knew that is was substantiated apparently by the statement which I saw.

Q. You knew that was the claim he was to make, from whom?—A. That he was to make on behalf of Boland from the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Co.

Q. From whom did you know that he was to make that claim?—A. Oh, I knew that that was the talk from Mr. Watson. I am not sure whether Mr. Boland referred to the amount in his several conversations with me or not.

Q. What knowledge had you of the value of the plant and assets of the Marian Coal Co.?—A. I had none. I never had. I had never seen it.

Q. What knowledge had you of the valuation put upon the plant and assets of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co.?—A. None.

Q. Had you any knowledge, and if so what, of the valuation put upon the rate claimed by either the Marian Coal Co. or the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co.?—A. I only know what I have already said, that it was 43 cents, or something like that—forty-odd cents.

Q. Was there an interview between yourself and C. G. Boland and Mr. Watson in your office on or about August, 23, 1911?—A. I have no memory of any.

Q. Or at any other time?—A. I have no remembrance of any such at any time.

Q. Did you make any suggestion at any time to anybody or under any circumstances that the amount to be paid Mr. Watson for his services should be put in writing?—A. No; oh, no. Mr. Watson came to me and told me he was to get $5,000.

Q. You have already testified to an interview, though you have not fixed the date, as I recall it, at which Mr. Truesdale was present, October 5, 1911. Tell us, please, whether you were requested to be present at that interview.—A. No.

Q. Or at any other interview?—A. No.

Q. Or was any request ever made to you to be present at any interview between Mr. Watson and any official of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Co.?—A. No; no request of that kind.

Q. Tell us, please, what, if anything, you had to do with the case of Peale against the Marian Coal Co. except as appears in the record of the court.—A. None. I had none. I made two orders in that case; that is all.

Q. They appear of record?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you have any connection or do anything in regard to that case after you ceased to be judge of that court?—A. Certainly not.

Q. It appears in evidence—and some point has been made of it—that several of the letters which were written were written on paper which bore the Commerce Court title. Will you tell us, please, how that came about?—A. Very probably because I did not have any other paper.

Q. Where were those letters written?—A. I think they were written in my office by dictation. I think some of them appear in my handwriting; I am not sure about that. I have not examined them. So far as they appear by dictation, if they are dated Scranton, they were dictated to my stenographer and she took them off, using the paper that was at hand.

Q. Tell us, please, what object you had, if any, in using that paper instead of some other paper?—A. No object; no purpose in that.

Q. You have told us that you acted in these matters partially at the request of Mr. Watson and partially at the request of Mr. C. G. Boland. Did you act in it at the request of anyone else except those two gentlemen?—A. No.

Q. Tell us, please, whether or not there was any agreement or understanding of any kind or character, express or implied, that you were to receive any portion of the fee of $5,000 which Mr. Watson was to get if he satisfactorily settled that case?

Mr. Manager STERLING. Mr. President, I object. It calls for a conclusion. The witness can state what was said and done.

Mr. SIMPSON. I asked him if there was any agreement or understanding, express or implied. It calls for a statement as to a fact.

Mr. Manager STERLING. It calls for a conclusion. It is for the Senate to determine whether there was any agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The stenographer will read the question.

The question was read by the Reporter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the counsel will be permitted to inquire of the respondent what agreement there was, if any.

Mr. SIMPSON. I am quite willing to put it in that way. [To the witness:] What agreement, if any, express or implied, was there between you and Mr. Watson or anybody else on the subject of your getting any part or portion of the fee of $5,000 if he settled satisfactorily the litigation between the Marian Coal Co. and the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co.?—A. None whatever. The matter was never suggested; never mentioned.

Q. Will you tell us, please, whether or not there was any conversation or letter with you or written to or by you that you were at any time or under any circumstances to get any part or portion of any sum over $95,000 which might be received by Mr. Watson in the settlement of the controversy?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the counsel should put that question in the same way as the other.

Mr. SIMPSON. My colleague interrupted me when I was drafting it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What, if anything.

Mr. SIMPSON. I thought it was put that way. [To the witness:] What, if any, conversation or correspondence was there in that regard?—A. None whatever; absolutely none.

Q. What knowledge, if any, had you, assuming it to exist, of any intention to give you any money or consideration whatsoever for the services which you rendered or that which you did in regard to that matter?—A. I had none. I do not believe anybody would have offered it.

Q. Will you tell us, please, then, if there was nothing to be paid to you of any kind or character?

Mr. Manager STERLING. Mr. President, as to the last answer of the witness——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not desire to hear from counsel. The last answer was improper.

Mr. SIMPSON. The last part of the answer.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I should like to say, inasmuch as the one asking the question is a very able lawyer and the one answering it is a very distinguished judge, they ought to confine the examination within the required limit without any objection on the part of the managers being necessary.

Mr. SIMPSON. You can not say that the question asked was in the slightest degree objectionable.

Mr. Manager STERLING. The answer was quite improper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will rule that the last sentence was not a legitimate answer to the question and is not to be considered as evidence.

Mr. SIMPSON. It was not even responsive to the question. [To the witness:] If there was no consideration to be paid to you for your services in relation to this matter, will you tell us, please, why you undertook to do what you did in that settlement?—A. What was asked me in the first place to do was a very inconsiderable matter. It was simply that I would speak of Mr. Watson to Mr. Loomis, that it would make a favorable introduction. That was the whole thing. There was never any idea of doing anything more. Whatever I did beyond that I was pressed to it by Mr. Watson and by Mr. Boland, and out of friendship to them, as much I might say out of friendship to Mr. C. G. Boland as out of friendship to Mr. Watson.

Q. State what if any influence as judge you exercised in relation to the matter.—A. None that I was conscious of.

Q. From whom did you first learn that the Oxford colliery was for sale?—A. I learned that from Mr. John Henry Jones.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I submit the following question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota presents the following question, which he desires to have propounded to the witness. It will be read to him.

The Secretary read as follows:

Was this case, or any part of it, pending in the Commerce Court while you were helping to effect a settlement, as you have stated?

The WITNESS. It was not. The effort at settlement was to prevent it getting there.

Mr. Manager STERLING. Mr. President, in order that I may understand, I should like to inquire what case was referred to in the question. Is that the Peale case that was in the district court?

The WITNESS. I understood it was the case with regard to rates pending between the Marian Coal Co. and the D., L. & W. Railroad.

Mr. Manager STERLING. It was not the case, then, in which the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. was a party in the Commerce Court?

The WITNESS. It was not in the Commerce Court.

Mr. SIMPSON. It was the rate case before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. Manager STERLING. The Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. was involved in two cases, one pending in the Interstate Commerce Commission and one pending in the Commerce Court. I think the witness ought to know which case he is referring to, and I doubt if he does.

The WITNESS. I would like the question again read to me, if I may have that done.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I submit that the statement is quite objectionable, when the manager says that the witness does not know what he is talking about. I think he knows very much more about it than does the manager.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I did not say that with any idea but of fairness to the witness and so that we, too, might understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the manager to make the suggestion in order to correct a mistake. The question will again be read to the witness.

The Secretary read the question, as follows:

Q. Was this case, or any part of it, pending in the Commerce Court while you were helping to effect a settlement of it, as you have stated?

The WITNESS. I understand that question is directed to the case that was pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission in which the Marian Coal Co. was the complainant and the D., L. & W. Railroad Co. was the respondent. It was with reference to the settlement of that case that the negotiations undertaken by Mr. Watson were carried on. That case was not in the Commerce Court, and is not there now, as I understand, though I do not know whether it is or not, but it was not there then. If it had been settled, it would never have come there.

Mr. SIMPSON. Is that all, Mr. Manager STERLING?

Mr. Manager STERLING. That is all.

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON.) From whom did you first learn that the Oxford colliery was for sale?—A. I first learned that from Mr. John Henry Jones.

Q. What did you do in relation to that, stating it in a very brief way, please?—A. Mr. John Henry Jones said that the Oxford colliery, the Oxford washery, which was washing the dump belonging to the Girard estate at a place called Shaft, near Shenandoah, in Schuylkill County, Pa., was to be sold. He said that there were differences between the stockholders, and that the matter had been put in the hands of one of the stockholders, Mr. Schlosser, of Pittston, Pa., and that he was authorized to dispose of it.

Q. Did you have any correspondence with Mr. Schlosser on the subject?—A. I called up Mr. Schlosser on the telephone and asked him with regard to it. He confirmed what Mr. Jones said, and he told me that he would write a letter making a definite offer or giving an option upon the property.

Q. Did you have any correspondence with him in regard to it?—A. That was expressed in a letter. There were two or three letters from him on the subject.

Q. Where are those letters?—A. I forget whether I have them, though I think I have not. You may have them there. [After examining.] I find I have them here. [Producing letters.]

Mr. SIMPSON handed the letters to Mr. Manager STERLING.

Mr. Manager STERLING (after examining the letters). There is no objection to those letters, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMPSON. I will offer the letters in evidence, and not ask that they be read at this time, Mr. President.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Why not read them?

Mr. SIMPSON. My colleague prefers that the letters be read. I ask that they be marked as exhibits and read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The letters were marked as exhibits, as below indicated, and read as follows:

PITTSTON, PA., August 5, 1911.

Hon. R. W. ARCHBALD,
Federal Building, Scranton, Pa.

MY DEAR SIR: I beg to advise that the royalty on Oxford coal is as follows: Prepared sizes, 45 cents per gross ton; pea, 30 cents per gross ton; buckwheat, 15 cents per gross ton; rice, 7½ cents per gross ton, and barley, 5 cents per gross ton. The minimum royalty is $100 per month or $1,200 annually.

Yours, very truly, M. SCHLOSSER.

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON.) To whom did the Oxford colliery belong?—A. It belonged to the Oxford Coal Co., as I remember, or to Maderia, Hill & Co., I am not sure which—I think Maderia, Hill & Co. were stockholders in it, and were the commission men who sold the coal.

Q. Had it any connection with any railroad company?—A. Oh, none whatever—none that I know of; it is an individual concern.

Q. It appears in evidence here that that was not purchased by you or that there was not a sale of it made by you. Why was that?—A. It was first offered to the Laurel line, but Mr. Conn told me that he could not get a proper rate on the coal from there, so he did not take it. Subsequently it was offered to Mr. Peale, according to letters which are in evidence here. That, I think, was at the instance of Mr. Jones after I had left the district court bench and was in the Commerce Court. Then it was offered to Mr. Thomas Howell Jones, whom we familiarly know as "Tom Star Jones." That was along in the summer of that year. He took an option on it in favor of himself, I think, and Mr. Howell Harris; but, upon examination of the property, he reported to me that the dump which was being used was so far depleted that it was not worth any such sum as was being asked, and that there could be no deal about it.

Q. That was the end of the matter, so far as that dump was concerned, was it?—A. That was the end of the matter, but not altogether—no; because that led on to something else.

Q. Well, I am speaking of that particular dump.—A. Yes; as to that particular dump.

Q. Now, from whom did you first learn that other culm dumps in the neighborhood of the Oxford washery might be bought?—A. That was stated to me at the very beginning by Mr. Schlosser. He said that there were other dumps belonging to the Girard estate, and he thought that the dump that the Oxford Coal Co. was washing could be helped out by getting some one of these other dumps.

Q. And these other dumps were what?—A. These other dumps were covered by a lease to the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., which lease expires on December 31, 1913.

Q. And that is what has been spoken of here as Packer No. 3?—A. Yes.

Q. Now, from whom did you first learn that it was possible that the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. or Coal Co. would not object to the sale of Packer No. 3 or the leasing of it?—A. If I may anticipate that, I will say that Mr. Jones, upon going down there and looking over the property, had identified Packer No. 3 as the dump that was desirable to help out the workings of the Oxford colliery, and then I undertook to see whether that could not be obtained.

Q. You say "Mr. Jones." Which one of the Joneses do you mean?—A. Mr. Tom Star Jones.

Q. Tom Star Jones?—A. Yes.

Q. We have had in evidence here a large number of letters in relation to that, which I do not desire to go into because I do not think they can be added to in any material way; but it appears in one of those letters that you wrote to Mr. Kirkpatrick asking him for an interview. Will you tell us, please, where you were going on the occasion when you stopped off in Philadelphia to see Mr. Kirkpatrick in regard to it?—A. I was on my way to Washington here to attend a session of the Commerce Court.

Q. And what, if anything, has been done in relation to that matter since the date of that visit to Mr. Kirkpatrick on February 12, 1912?—A. Nothing whatever.

Q. Had you any knowledge in relation to the matter or any intention to apply for a lease of Packer No. 3 except as it was led up to in the way you have testified?—A. No; not independently of the Oxford. It was suggested in that connection that Packer No. 3 could be washed very much better by itself; that it was not worth while to tie up to the Oxford, but it was in connection with the Oxford attempted deal that I was led to look into the matter of obtaining Packer No. 3.

Q. What attempts, if any, were there to conceal the fact of your connection with this matter?—A. There were none. I was aiding the matter all the time and speaking of it myself, and my name figured in every transaction.

Q. It is stated in article No. 3 that you unlawfully and corruptly used your official position and office as judge to secure from the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. the agreement that the Girard Trust might lease to you Packer No. 3 dump. What is the fact in regard to that?—A. Why, there certainly is no fact of that character.

Q. Was there any intention on your part that it should have any such effect?—A. None whatever.

Q. Do you remember the case of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. against the Interstate Commerce Commission, filed in the Commerce Court and referred to in article No. 4?—A. That was the first case, practically, that was argued before the Commerce Court—at its first argument in April, 1911.

Q. Were you present at its argument?—A. I was present, and participated in the hearing.

Q. How much of a record was there in that case?—A. The record was made up of a carbon copy, furnished by counsel and stipulated into the case, of the testimony that had been taken before the Interstate Commerce Commission, supplemented by testimony that was taken before an examiner appointed in the case before it came into the Commerce Court, when it was pending in the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Kentucky. There was considerable of a record.

Q. What were the respective claims of counsel for the parties in that suit?—A. Well, it is very difficult to give in a few words what their respective claims were. It was an extended argument, with very extended briefs, but the main contention on the part of the Louisville & Nashville attorneys was that the order of the commission reducing the rates there involved was not sustained by any of the reasons given by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that, in fact, the reasons which the Interstate Commerce Commission gave as the basis of its order were not founded upon any facts. The contention on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission, represented by Mr. Lamb, and the United States itself, represented by Mr. Fowler, assistant to the Attorney General, was that the Commerce Court could not go into that question; that the ruling of the Interstate Commerce Commission with regard to those rates was conclusive.

Q. Can you tell, in a few words, what is the difference between class rates and commodity rates, so that Senators may understand just the question arising out of that?—A. All rates are divided into classes, as I understand, except as specific commodities are taken out of the class to which they are assigned and given a rate by themselves. Class rates run by numbers, from 1 to 6, and also have some letter designation—A, B, C, D, E. I think the commodity rates would be for a special thing, like glassware or furniture or sand or coal or something specific like that.

Q. And the class rates would include a number of different commodities of the same general character?—A. Class rates apply to all the commodities that are put together in that class.

Q. Why did you write to Mr. Bruce the letters which have been produced and offered in evidence here?—A. That calls for somewhat of an extended explanation.

Mr. Manager STERLING. Mr. President, we object to the witness stating why he wrote the letters. The fact that he did write them is all that this witness has any right to tell.

Mr. SIMPSON. I submit, sir, that where we are in a court, in which the intention of the party is a vital thing, he has the right to say why he did a given thing, so that the judges of the facts and the law may determine whether there was an intention to commit wrong. He has a perfect right, I submit, to state that, so that the Senate may know what his intention was. If he had no intention to do a wrong, then he has done no wrong, so far as the law goes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Chair remembers correctly, the articles do not charge him with intent to do wrong. They charge him with specific acts.

Mr. SIMPSON. But, there is involved in every charge which involves an offense an intent, and there is a distinct charge that he did this thing corruptly. Unless there is an intent the law says there can be no wrong. A man may do innocently a thing about which no complaint can be made, and do the same thing corruptly or with a corrupt intent, and there may be a just complaint of it. That has ripened, sir, into a maxim of law, that until there is an intent to do wrong no wrong, legally speaking, has been done. That is one of the fundamental principles of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence; it always has been, and I trust always will be. The question which the witness has before him is to reach to that fact, so that the Senate may determine whether or not there was such an intent.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I should like to say, Mr. President——

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Before the manager proceeds, if I may be permitted, it was suggested a while ago by Mr. Manager STERLING that the witness has no right to testify to what his intent was, although that is the matter in question. I sent for one of the textbooks of law, and I should like to read a section from it. Jones on Evidence, last edition, section 170, page 191, has this to say:

It is evident that the most satisfactory mode of proving the motives or intent with which an act is done is to show the facts and circumstances accompanying the act. It is not relevant for a witness to state the motives or intentions of another person. It has been held in a few cases that a party can not state directly his own motives or intent; that such testimony can not be directly contradicted, and because it must often be of little value, the proof must consist of the surrounding circumstances which illustrate the nature of the act.

That is what I understand to be the contention of Mr. Manager STERLING.

But it is the prevailing rule, sustained by the great weight of authority, that whenever the motive, intention, or belief of a person is relevant to the issue it is competent for such person to testify directly upon that point—whether he is a party to the suit or not. To state the rule in another form, when the motive of a witness in performing a particular act or in making a particular declaration becomes a material issue in a cause or reflects important light upon such issue, he may himself be sworn in regard to it, notwithstanding the diminished credit to which his testimony may be entitled as coming from the mouth of an interested witness.

The words "testify directly upon that point" being in italics—

There is a note there, No. 10, which cites, I should judge, about 40 or 50 cases in support of that doctrine.

It is hardly necessary to add that such testimony is not conclusive.

Of course, we do not claim that it is conclusive.

Now, Mr. President, in this case the charge is made that Judge Archbald wrongfully entered into this correspondence with Mr. Bruce. After reciting what was done, the article charges that he did it secretly, wrongfully, and unlawfully. If the contention of the managers simply be that it is an impeachable and criminal offense for a judge to write a letter to one of the counsel in a case without any wrongful or improper intention, of course, then it would not be necessary for us to pursue this line of inquiry; but if it is claimed, or, indeed, if any Member of the Senate should think—and I submit that what the managers claim here is not conclusive at all—that it might be important to know whether he intended to aid this company and was trying wrongfully to help it, the witness ought to be permitted to testify as to what his intention was.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I think, Mr. President, the law read by counsel determines that the question is improper. There are two classes of criminal cases, in one of which the intent may be expressly testified to and in the other it must be inferred. In one class of cases the law conclusively presumes that the accused intended the reasonable consequences and results of his act. There is another class of cases where a specific intent is charged. To illustrate: If one is indicted for assault with intent to kill, a specific intent is charged in the indictment. In that kind of a case—and it is the kind of cases referred to in the authority just read—the courts have held that the witness could rebut that presumption and testify that he did not intend to kill; but in other cases, where no specific intent is charged, the law presumes that the accused intended the reasonable consequences of what he did. In this case, if it was the reasonable consequence of his letters to assist or aid this railroad company or to give them a secret advantage in the trial of this lawsuit against its opponents, then the law conclusively presumes that he intended that as the result of this correspondence, and he can not be heard to say that he had no such intent.

The WITNESS. If the Presiding Officer will permit me, I will state the facts and circumstances under which the letters were written and what the consequences were.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If counsel will vary the question so as to correspond with the suggestion of the witness, the Chair thinks that would be legitimate.

Mr. SIMPSON. I do not see how counsel can do otherwise when the witness has made the suggestion. I will vary the question accordingly. [To the witness:] Go on and state the facts and circumstances, please.

The WITNESS. When this case came up for consultation, after argument, the judges were not united in their views. There was quite a diversity of view, and I found myself in the minority. The view expressed at the final consultation before the judges separated for the summer was to dismiss the proceedings. I dissented from that view, and I understood that one of the other judges probably would join me in that dissent. During the summer vacation I undertook to formulate my views. I made an extended study of the case. I have here some of the many notes, or most of the notes, which I made upon that occasion. In writing that dissent the views that I expressed in that dissent were that the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission was not sustained in any particular by the evidence which they had before them. I read all the testimony and made an abstract of it. In the course of that I came upon the statement made by Mr. Compton in his testimony before two of the members of the Intestate Commerce Commission with regard to one point, and it was in order to see whether I apprehended what Mr. Compton intended in his testimony that I wrote the first letter to Mr. Bruce.

I understood Mr. Compton to negative a certain circumstance with regard to rates; and the Interstate Commerce Commission apparently, in drawing up their opinion, had taken the contrary view. It was simply to throw light upon that and to enable me to know whether I was proceeding upon proper grounds in the dissent which I intended to express that I wrote that letter. I wrote my dissenting opinion and sent copies of it around to the different judges along about the last of September, and when we gathered together again in October I found that apparently my dissenting opinion had made some impression upon the court. That dissenting opinion, with changes and adaptations, was finally made the opinion of the court, and all the judges coincided in that view with one exception. Judge Mack raised another question about the variations that had been made from what is spoken of in the opinion as the Cooley award, which figures somewhat in the opinion and in the case, by reason of the change that had been made in the tariffs into the southeastern territory from Ohio and Mississippi crossings, by reason of the change from class to commodity rates and by a number of commodity rates that were given. That question was one which had not been raised in argument, and for the purpose of doing justice to counsel, who had not had an opportunity to meet that question, which, as I say, was raised by Judge Mack and not by counsel on the other side, I wrote the second letter, so that counsel might be advised that that question was up. As it turned out, neither of those letters figured in the position taken by the opinion, and those letters really in the final disposition of the case never have had any effect upon it whatever.

Q. Why did you not send copies of those letters to counsel for the Interstate Commerce Commission and counsel for the United States?—A. Simply because, as I say, in the first place, it was simply for my own private guidance. The first letter, in formulating my dissenting opinion, which I had no idea would be more than a dissent, and afterwards, both with regard to that letter and what was spoken of in the second letter, amounted to nothing in the disposition of the case. It would take too long to point it out, but that is very clear to anybody who is acquainted with the case and who will look at that part of the opinion in which those two questions come up.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I send an interrogatory to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks that a question be propounded to the witness. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

Why did you write only to the lawyer in whose favor you had already made up your mind?

The WITNESS. The first letter was written in regard to the testimony of Mr. Compton, and for the purpose of clearing up what seemed to be an ambiguity, but I did not consider it so, but I wanted to confirm my own views about it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I send to the desk the following question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington propounds an inquiry, which will be read to the witness.

The Secretary read as follows:

Why did you not call the attention of the members of the court to the correspondence you had with Mr. Bruce?

The WITNESS. The correspondence I had with Mr. Bruce became practically of no importance because of the views which were finally embodied in the opinion. As I say, I could point that out very readily. If anyone reads the opinion he will find that so far as Mr. Compton's testimony is concerned, in the opinion it is assumed that Mr. Compton's testimony was exactly as the Interstate Commerce Commission regarded it. That is assumed in the opinion and discussed upon that basis. In regard to the variation from the Cooley award by reason of the changes in commodity rates, that also is taken up and considered just as it was stated by Judge Mack, and without regard to anything suggested in the letter of Mr. Bruce.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I submit a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon sends to the desk the following inquiry.

The Secretary read as follows:

Did you inform any of the associate judges of the fact of your having written the letters to which you have just referred and of the replies you received?

The WITNESS. I do not remember that, if I ever did.

Mr. SIMPSON. I want to say, Mr. President, that it is admitted in this case that the first letter was attached to the record and is attached to-day as the case is pending in the United States Supreme Court.

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON.) Do you know who attached that letter to the record?—A. I assume I did, because I do not know how else it could have gotten there. I have no memory on the subject.

Q. There appear in the letter written by you to Mr. Bruce under date of March 8, 1912, and offered in evidence by the managers as Exhibit No. 61, these words:

A considerable portion of it—

That is the opinion—

if not, indeed, the best, is from the hand of another member of the court, and it is probably there that you find the enunciation of principles which you particularly commend.

Who was that other member of the court?—A. Judge Knapp.

Q. And what were those principles—the ones you have referred to?—A. In part, those which I have just referred to. It is Judge Knapp's entire composition in both the cases I have just spoken of, and there are other parts; there are a good many things in my dissenting opinion that were cut out at the suggestion of Judge Knapp and other members of the court, in order that the judges might get as nearly as possible together and agree together as nearly as possible.

Mr. REED. I have a question which I did not have time to write when we were on the subject, which I will send up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri propounds the following inquiry, which will be submitted to the witness.

The Secretary read as follows:

Q. Did you consider it proper, in passing upon a doubtful point in evidence, to hear only from that lawyer who would certainly desire to concur in your view?

The WITNESS. I certainly should not have written the letter if I had supposed it was improper.

Mr. REED. I should like to have the question read again to the witness, so that he may answer all of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be read.

The Secretary again read the question.

The WITNESS. I certainly do not consider it proper to do that, if that answers the question.

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON.) Turning, now, to article 5, will you tell us, please, how long you have known Frederick Warnke?—A. I have known Mr. Frederick Warnke from the time he was elected recorder of deeds, I being president judge of the county at that time. I forget just the date of that; it must be 10 or 12 years ago, because I have been on the Federal bench 12 years.

Q. There is testimony here of a conversation had between you and him in relation to his claim against the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. Will you please tell us what that conversation was?—A. Mr. Frederick Warnke came to me and told me with regard to certain difficulties which he had had with the Reading Railroad Co. over an operation in Schuylkill County, Pa. He said that he had a lease which covered underground workings, and also, I think, some washing; that he had invested quite a sum of money there, and his washery or his breaker—I forget which—had burned down and he had rebuilt it, and then finally he was brought face to face with the fact that the Reading Railroad Co. told him he was acting under a lease that was not assignable, and that he had no rights there. He said that Mr. Richards was the person who had enforced this against him, and he wanted me to see Mr. Richards and see whether Mr. Richards would not reconsider that question.

Q. What did you do in consequence of that conversation?—A. I got into communication with Mr. Richards. I forget whether it was by telephone or by letter. I know I finally got a telegram and then, I think, a letter fixing the date, which my impression is I suggested, somewhere the last part of November a year ago, when I was to meet him at Pottsville in regard to this matter.

Q. It appears from the letter offered in evidence by the managers, dated November 24, 1911, Exhibit 85, page 744, that you said that you were going up to Pottsville on some other matter. What was the occasion of your visit?—A. I was going to Pottsville to confer with my nephew, Col. James Archbald, who is the engineer in charge of the Girard estate, with regard to the leasing of Packer No. 3 from the Girard estate.

Q. Did you go there on that occasion?—A. I went down there for that purpose.

Q. And did you see Mr. Richards?—A. I saw Mr. Richards.

Q. Tell us what occurred, please.—A. I went to his office and let it be known that I was there and he came to see me. Then I stated my errand, which was in substance what I have already said; what Mr. Warnke asked me to do. He then called for a budget which he had of numerous papers bearing upon the same subject, in which it appeared that the matter had been called to his attention and to Mr. Baer's attention, Mr. Baer being the president of the road, by several other parties, including ex-Congressman Howell, an attorney at law of Scranton, and he went into the matter at length, to show that, as he thought, Mr. Warnke had been given all the consideration he was entitled to.

Q. What afterwards, if anything, was done in regard to it?—A. I had to coincide in a large measure with what Mr. Richards said about the subject. I had no idea that this matter had been brought to their attention in any other way than by Mr. Warnke himself, and so I simply told Mr. Richards that I had nothing further to say, and I came home.

Q. What, if anything, was done by you in relation to the matter afterwards?—A. I told Mr. Warnke—just how soon I could not tell or in what way—that Mr. Richards would not reconsider the question.

Q. Did that close the matter so far as you were concerned?—A. Yes; that closed the matter.

Q. What knowledge, if any, had you that the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. had adopted a rule that they would not lease their culm dumps?—A. I knew of no such rule.

Q. What knowledge had you, if any, that the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. had such a rule?—A. I knew nothing about that.

Q. It is charged in article 5 that you used your influence as a judge of the Federal court in relation to that matter. Will you tell us, please, what is the fact in regard to it?

Mr. Manager STERLING. We object to the question.

Mr. SIMPSON. I will change the form of the question to avoid, perhaps, one of the branches of the objection.

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON.) What, if anything, was said or done by you to exercise any influence as a Federal judge in reference to this matter——

Mr. Manager STERLING. We object to that question.

The WITNESS. I have——

Mr. SIMPSON. Do not answer the question, please.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks a part of the question should be eliminated. You may ask what he did or said in regard to the matter, but as to the motive involved, that is another thing.

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON.) What, if anything, was said or done by you as a Federal judge to influence anybody in regard to it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the criticism that the Chair makes is with respect to asking him what he, as a Federal judge, did to influence anybody. That is not correct, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. SIMPSON. I am very much at a loss to know how to word the question in order to meet the charge which is made in this article. This article distinctly charges that he used his influence as a Federal judge in regard to this matter. Now, that either is or is not true. I have the right to meet it by evidence to show that it is not true; and the question which I am putting is directed expressly upon that ground.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that counsel is authorized to prove everything said and done by the witness.

Mr. SIMPSON. That is undoubtedly my right. That I have done; and I have, sir, I submit, a right to go a step further. I have the right to show whether or not there was any intention on his part to do anything; whether his mind had in it the evil intent which is the necessary factor in reference to a charge of crime such as is made here.

Now, it is undoubtedly true, and I am answering just the point suggested by Mr. Manager STERLING a while ago in regard to that matter, that in that class of cases where, for instance, to use an illustration, if I point a loaded pistol at a human being and deliberately draw the trigger of that pistol, and I know it is loaded, and it goes off and kills a man, there is presumed from that fact an intent to do a wrong. But this is not the class of cases that belongs to that category at all. Here the whole purpose rests in the intent. Did I do a thing with an intent to do a wrong? It is not a necessary result of that which I do that a given thing shall be brought to pass. That may or may not be so. It is the purpose or the intent in the mind of the man who acts, and neither you nor I nor anyone else can know what that intent was except by producing the evidence of the witnesses in regard to it. That is the reason it is entirely outside of the class of cases to which Mr. Manager STERLING refers and is within the class referred to in the extract from Jones on Evidence, which was read by Mr. Worthington.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, may I add a word? This is a matter that applies to all the articles and to everything of a serious nature, it seems to me, which is charged against this respondent. I have in mind a transaction of which I have cognizance, which I think will illustrate this. A judge in this city, a Federal judge who held high station, went to the office of a lawyer in this city for the purpose of buying a house to live in—a lawyer who practiced and was liable to practice in the judge's court. I did not know anything about the transaction until it was over. If that judge should be indicted for going to that lawyer and trying to get that house on favorable terms or for less than it was worth, or charged with going there and trying to influence that lawyer to sell him that property, what earthly means would there be of determining whether he went there to use his influence as a judge with the lawyer, the lawyer thinking he might, in the future, get favors in the judge's court, or whether he went there in the ordinary way, just as this judge unquestionably did, for the purpose of buying the property, without such a thing as has been suggested ever entering his mind?

Now, in this particular transaction we have a single occurrence—Mr. Warnke asking his friend, Judge Archbald, to speak to Mr. Richards in his behalf, for the purpose of letting him have some relief, no matter what it was, and the judge having business at the place where Mr. Richards was, asked him to do it. Mr. Richards said he could not do it and explained why, and that was the end of it.

Now, Judge Archbald is brought here, subject to the possible penalty of being bereft of his office, and being prevented forever from holding any office under the United States, and being forever disgraced. And why? It must be because the managers intend to contend that when he did that he intended that Mr. Richards should be influenced by his position as judge to do something to favor Warnke. Now, if there is anything settled in the law, as shown by the decisions in the textbook from which I have read—

> Whenever the intention, motive, or belief of a person is relevant to the issue it is competent for such person to testify directly upon that point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that that is not the exact question asked.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I understood the Chair to say, in excluding the question, not to ask about the motive. Now, it is the motive we want to ask about, and it is the motive which, it seems to me, the Senate wants to know about.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question was not asked what was the motive in certain acts put in evidence. The question, if the Chair remembers correctly, was in different form. The question was——

Mr. POMERENE. I ask to have the question repeated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be read by the Reporter.

Mr. SIMPSON. I will withdraw the question, if I may, because if we are fighting over words it is not worth while, and I will put the question directly, as the Chair suggests, and that is, What motive, if any, had you in seeing Mr. Richards in regard to this matter?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that it may be answered——

Mr. Manager STERLING rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But if the manager objects, the witness will suspend for a moment. The Chair was premature in ruling upon the question. It did not know that the manager was going to object.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I think the question he asks now is objectionable. It seems to be an unnecessary question, because everybody knows his motive was to purchase this dump or have this transaction.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Oh, no. There is nothing in regard to the dump in this transaction.

Mr. Manager STERLING. Well, his purpose was, of course, to accomplish what he went after. Everybody will agree to that. And if the question is to elicit an answer to that effect we do not object, but say it is immaterial. But if it is expected that this witness is to reply that it was not his motive to use his influence as a judge, then the quesion is improper.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. That is exactly what we do expect to ask him.

Mr. Manager STERLING. Then we object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it would be a matter of argument afterwards as to whether or not the testimony of the witness is in accord with the facts, but the Chair thinks there ought to be liberality in a case of this kind.

Mr. Manager STERLING. Before the Chair makes its final decision I should like to make reply to what these gentlemen have said.

I agree with the President that it is a matter of argument. We can argue the conclusions which the managers reach, and counsel can argue the conclusions which they reach, and they will draw their inferences. Therefore it is not proper for the witness to argue the case or give his conclusions or give his motives or give his purpose. The best argument that can be adduced in favor of the objection to this question is the illustration used by counsel, Mr. Simpson, who said this: That if one man direct a gun toward another and touch the trigger, and if the gun is discharged and the other man is killed, the law will presume that he intended to murder the man. And so if a judge directs his speech toward another along a certain line and convinces the other that he has accomplished that thing, then the law will conclusively presume that he intended to accomplish that thing. The illustration is in point, and it proves that the objection we make to the question is valid.

Mr. SIMPSON. Instead of that, sir——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks those presumptions are not conclusive presumptions. They are presumptions; there is no doubt about it; and are conclusive unless rebutted. The Chair will admit the evidence.

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON.) Will you tell us, please, Judge, what was your motive in seeing Mr. Richards in regard to this matter?—A. I simply went there as a friend of Mr. Warnke to do a friendly act. I said nothing with regard to my mission, except just simply that—to get a reconsideration for Mr. Warnke of the question of his standing with that company. There was nothing said outside of that.

Q. Tell us, please, whether or not there was anything to be paid to you for seeing Mr. Richards on the subject.—A. Nothing whatever; nothing.

Q. What had your seeing Mr. Richards for Mr. Warnke in relation to that matter to do with the purchase and sale of the old gravity fill?—A. It had none.

Q. There appears in evidence in this case a note for $510, given on April 6, 1912, by the Premier Coal Co. to the order of its stockholders, and indorsed by them and handed over to you. Will you tell us, please, for what that note was given?—A. It was a commission on the sale of the old gravity fill. The gravity fill was on the abandoned line of what was originally known as the Washington Coal Co., as it happened, laid out by my father; and subsequently it was called the Pennsylvania Coal Co. It was a gravity road with planes, as they called them, on which the cars were drawn up and then run from the top of one plane to the next by gravity. I should say about 25 years ago that was given up for a locomotive road, and this was a fill, quite a large fill. I was acquainted with it. My brother and I at one time, about 18 or 20 years ago, had thought of washing it. It was on the property of the Lacoe & Shiffer Coal Co.

I became acquainted with that fact, and I corresponded with Mr. Berry and secured an option from him. That option was carried along from early in the spring of 1911 until about a year after that, not always in writing, but in part verbally. Among others who went to see it was Mr. Warnke, on behalf of the Standard Brewing Co. The Standard Brewing Co. did not take it, and then Mr. Warnke conceived the idea of taking it for himself. He finally got together Mr. Swingle and his brother-in-law, Mr. Kiser, and Mr. Schlager, who was a coal man, and they organized this company and made a deal for the property with Mr. Berry. They met in my office and there the arrangement was practically consummated.

While I knew then about the gravity fill, it had been particularly called to my attention by John Henry Jones, and Mr. Jones had an arrangement with Mr. Warnke by which Mr. Warnke was to pay a commission in case of the sale. I think at one time Mr. Jones said he had an arrangement by which he was to pay as high as a thousand dollars. After the consummation of the sale, Mr. Jones—I have to state this on hearsay—talked with Mr. Warnke about it.

Q. Do not tell us about that.—A. Well, I will not, except to explain that as the result of what Mr. Jones had communicated to me that Mr. Warnke had communicated to his associates—no; I had a communication by telephone with Mr. Swingle or Mr. Kiser, one or the other, at least with their office, and they said that they would recognize the matter of the right to a commission. They were real estate men, and they understood how commissions were paid, and they would draw up a note and send it to me. They drew up a note for $510, including the discount, for four months. It was drawn to my order, and not to their own order, which was the correct way in order to make them the indorsers; and so I sent it back to them, and subsequently I called at their office and got the note in the final form. I took the note, indorsed it, and had it discounted at my bank, and I gave Mr. John Henry Jones a check for one-half of the money that realized. That check is here.

Q. What was the date when you gave to Mr. John Henry Jones his one-half of it?—A. Here is the check.

Q. Give us the date of it, please.—A. It is dated April 6. The stub shows to John Henry Jones, one-half commission on sale of old gravity fill, $250.

Q. Had any railroad company anything to do with the old gravity fill?—A. Nothing whatever.

Q. Did you know of the pendency of the investigation in this case at the time you received that note and had it discounted?—A. No; except what had been communicated to me, that there was an investigation by some one sent up to Scranton on the part of the Department of Justice, of which I had no other except this indirect notice.

Q. Had you any interview or conversation with Mr. Warnke about it prior to that time?—A. Yes. Mr. Warnke had told me that he had been called in by the representative. I do not know whether he gave me his name or not; I now know it was Mr. Wrisley Brown—and he wanted to know about some transaction; I forget what it was. He came to me to know whether he should go and testify. I said, "Of course; go ahead and tell them what you know."

Q. Was that before or after the giving of this note of April 6, 1912?—A. It must have been before.

Q. Before that?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know W. W. Rissinger?—A. I have known Mr. Rissinger for over 20 years. I think I first got acquainted with him when he and Mrs. Rissinger were members of a Bible class which I taught in that remote time.

Q. We are now dealing with article 7, so that we may have the record straight about that. Did you know of the gold-mining claim in Honduras in which he was interested?—A. I first heard about that from Mr. Bernard Moses, who lives there in Scranton, and who was in attendance at the hearing before the Judiciary Committee in May, but he was not examined as a witness. He told me—I really can not tell how the matter came up, because it was nearly five years ago—he told me about Mr. Rissinger going down into or proposing to engage in placer mining in Honduras.

Q. What interest had you in that company or concern that was interested in a gold-mining claim in Honduras?—A. Subsequently to that, I think, he brought Mr. Rissinger to my office, and we talked the matter over. Still later Mr. Rissinger brought Mr. Russell and Mr. Hamilton, who had the main concession of which Mr. Rissinger had a very small fraction. They had maps and plans, and laid them before me, and also came to my house, and we discussed the matter there, with an idea of taking an interest in the concession—that is, in the large concession, the one that they had.

Q. Did you take any interest in it?—A. I did not.

Q. It appears in evidence that Mr. Rissinger gave a note for $2,500 to the order of yourself and Mrs. Hutchinson and that you and she indorsed that note. What became of it after you indorsed it?—A. I only know what I have known since. I indorsed that note as an accommodation to Mr. Rissinger, and what he would do with the proceeds I do not know.

Q. Did you get any of them?—A. I certainly did not, or any benefit from it.

Q. Why did you indorse it?—A. As a mere matter of accommodation and friendliness.

Q. Was it indorsed for any interest in the Honduras company of which we have spoken?—A. It was not.

Q. What became of it after it was indorsed, so far as you know?—A. I understood, I know from what has happened since, that it was discounted by the County Savings Bank.

Q. Did you know it was to be presented to John T. Lenahan?—A. I never heard it had been, or was to be, until I heard Mr. Lenahan testify.

Q. You mean testify before the Judiciary Committee?—A. Before the Judiciary Committee.

Q. It appears in evidence that there was later on given to you certain shares of stock in the Scranton-Honduras Mining Co. For what was that stock given?—A. That stock, as I understood it, was given to me for the purpose of securing my indorsement at the time that I indorsed the note in the first instance. I understood from what Mr. Rissinger said that he was going to put in as collateral his own stock or interest that he held in the Davis Coal Co., a coal company in which he was interested, and which was being operated, and which I believed proved a success. That was not done, but before the note came around for renewal, along in February, he came and brought the shares and stock. From what was said at the time I gathered that and I always had that impression.

Mr. Manager STERLING. Mr. President, this witness has stated several times in relating this matter that he understood so-and-so. I should think the witness ought to state what was said between these gentlemen and let others determine what they understand to be the logical inference.

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON.) We want your recollection in regard to the matter. The word "understood" has two meanings.—A. It is nearly four years ago since this happened.

Q. State what your best recollection on the subject is; that is all.—A. My best recollection is that when Mr. Rissinger came to renew the note he brought this up and said that he had made this out for me for the purpose of securing me upon my indorsement.

Q. Who paid the interest on the note when it fell due?—A. Mr. Rissinger has paid the discount on it at all times.

Q. Who paid the principal?—A. I only know what Mr. Rissinger testified and what Mr. Ruth testified, that it had been paid.

Q. You did not pay it?—A. Oh, I did not pay it. I have not paid a cent on that thing.

Q. I am turning, now, to articles 8 and 9. You have several times testified to having met John Henry Jones. How long have you known him?—A. I think I had known him about five or six years, and I knew something about him before I had actually met him.

Q. It appears in evidence here that you drew a note for $500 to your own order, which was signed by Jones and then indorsed by you. For what was that note given?—A. I do not remember that I did draw the note. I indorsed the note. I indorsed a note that was made out in the form which is the correct form, as I understand it, made out to the payee. I did it for the accommodation of Mr. John Henry Jones, who had been to Venezuela and had an oil concession of some character which, he convinced me at the time, he had a good chance of negotiating in London. This note was for the purpose of raising money to get him there.

Q. After its indorsement, what was done with it?—A. I did not know what was done with it until Mr. Von Storch called me up and asked me whether I had indorsed such a note, which had been presented to him for discount. I will correct that to this extent: Some time before that, after the note had been indorsed and had left my hands, Mr. John Henry Jones told me that Mr. Edward Williams either was going to present it or had presented it to Mr. C. G. Boland to have it discounted.

Q. Did you tell him that he might do so?—A. I did not. I had nothing to do with it at that time. It was out of my hands.

Q. Tell us, please, what interview, if any, you had with Edward J. Williams in regard to the note.—A. No; I had no interview with him about it. The only one I spoke to in the matter was Mr. John Henry Jones, in the way I have stated.

Q. It has been suggested here that this note was given in order to obtain an interest on your part in this oil concession in Venezuela. What is the fact regarding that?—A. No; that is not the fact. After Mr. John Henry Jones was in London I got a letter from him, which I endeavored to find and have not been able to, in which it was suggested that I would have a certain interest as a result of the successful negotiations which he seemed to think he had consummated there.

Q. Did you take any interest in it?—A. I would have taken that interest if it had been consummated; yes, sir.

Q. But you did not? In point of fact, it was not consummated?—A. No.

Q. What knowledge had you, other than you have stated, that it ever, in fact, had been presented to either of the Bolands?—A. I know nothing except just what I have stated.

Q. The note as originally presented to Mr. Von Storch had upon it Mr. Edward J. Williams's indorsement. When did you first learn that Mr. Williams had indorsed the note?—A. I could not tell you really about that. I did not know that he was going to indorse it. I think I must have known something about it at the time of the first renewal. That is as near as I can get.

Q. You testified a while ago that on one occasion Mr. Jones said to you that it had been or would be presented to Mr. Boland. What knowledge or thought had you at the time of the pendency of the case of Peale against the Marian Coal Co.?—A. That case was decided on demurrer in September. This note was in November. I do not know the cases that are pending in my court. I never pay any attention to any case until it comes before me in court. I did not bear that case in mind. I had forgotten all about it after I had made the decision.

Q. Did you get any part of the proceeds of the note?—A. None.

Q. There appears in evidence here a paper signed by E. J. Williams, directed "To whom it may concern," and dated July 31, 1911. What knowledge had you of that paper?—A. I never heard of it until it was produced before the Judiciary Committee last May.

Q. Who paid the interest on that note?—A. Mr. Jones.

Q. Who paid so much of the principal as has, in fact, been paid?—A. Mr. Jones.

Q. Do you remember the case of the Risden Locomotive Iron Works against Von Storch?—A. That was a case that was heard before me without a jury. It was a suit to charge Mr. Von Storch and his cousin, Mr. T. Cramer Von Storch, as directors of a gold placer company that had been in operation in Montana. It was to charge them as directors because of the failure to file a statement. As I said, it was tried before me without a jury, and I disposed of the case. I think the claim was something like $10,000. I found against Mr. Von Storch and his cousin to the extent of about $800 or $1,000, I forget the exact amount. That case was disposed of along in January, 1909.

Q. That was how long before the giving of this note?—A. Pretty near a year.

Q. What connection had the giving of this note with that case?—A. None whatever.

Q. What connection, if any, had the discounting of it with this matter?—A. None whatever.

Q. It appears also in evidence that on one occasion you appointed Mr. Von Storch a receiver in bankruptcy. Will you tell us, please, the circumstances under which that appointment was made?—A. Mr. Von Storch is not in very active practice. He gives himself mainly to the presidency of his bank. Upon one occasion there was a bankrupt in that end of the city of Scranton which we commonly call the old borough of Providence. The Providence Bank were parties as indorsers upon the notes of this bankrupt, which made the Providence Bank somewhat concerned in the result. At the hearing before me, at which all sides were represented, Mr. Von Storch was either agreed on practically or I did appoint him receiver. At least I appointed him. I forget the immediate circumstances about it other than that.

Q. What connection, if any, had that with the giving or discounting of this note?—A. None whatever.

Q. It is averred in the articles we are here considering that you knew that this note could not be discounted in the usual commercial channels. Will you tell us, please, what the fact in regard to that is?—A. I know that my indorsement seemed to go.

Q. Did you or did you not know that it was discounted in the usual commercial channels?—A. I had reason to believe that it would be, and it was.

Q. What was your motive in giving the note?—A. Simply to accommodate Mr. Jones.

Q. Had you any other motive whatever?—A. None.

Q. Mr. Williams in his testimony said he told you that the note had been presented to the Bolands and that they had refused to discount it. Will you tell us, please, what the fact is on that subject?—A. As I have said, I think that Mr. John Henry Jones told me there that it was to be presented or had been presented. I do not remember that Mr. E. J. Williams ever said anything to me about it.

Q. Turning now to article 10, what relation are you, if any, to Henry W. Cannon?—A. Mr. Henry W. Cannon is own cousin of Mrs. Archbald.

Q. What have been the social relations between him and your family since you were married to Mrs. Archbald?—A. Mr. Cannon has visited at our house in Scranton. Mrs. Archbald and my children have visited at Mr. Cannon's house in New York.

Q. It appears in evidence here that in 1910 you and Mrs. Archbald became his guests on a trip to Europe. Will you tell us, please, how long before that time it was that you had taken a vacation?—A. The work in the middle district and the work that I had been called to do was very exacting. I had had no opportunity to take any vacation prior to that time since some time in August, 1903—nearly seven years.

Q. With whom did you consult prior to deciding whether or not you would go on that trip?—A. I consulted with my associates—the judges of the circuit. I remember that distinctly. I think I talked with Judge Gray——

Mr. Manager STERLING. Mr. President, we object to this testimony.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not know what there is in the articles that this testimony will elucidate.

Mr. SIMPSON. If I were to be asked what issue is in this article, I would be unable to state, notwithstanding what I have heard from the managers from time to time in this case. But the article states this issue as nearly as I can get at it. They say that Judge Archbald accepted an invitation from Mr. Cannon for a trip to Europe, knowing at the time that Mr. Cannon was connected with certain railroads which might—the Lord knows when and I hope He knows how, if anyone knows—at some time or other have some litigation in some court with which Judge Archbald might some time be connected. I propose to show, sir, that before he accepted the invitation he consulted with the judges of the circuit in which his court was. This was while he was a member of the district court. I propose to show that he stated the circumstances to them, and that they advised him that it was a wise and proper thing and that he should go, and that they knew at the time that Mr. Cannon was to pay the expenses of that trip.

That is the purpose. It bears directly on the purpose as to whether or not there was anything wrongful in accepting that invitation. I can not, for the soul of me, see how it is possible that there could be anything wrongful, but I have to meet what is charged.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is whether in the opinion of the Senate it is wrong, not whether it is wrong in the opinion of others.

Mr. SIMPSON. But, of course, I have to produce evidence by which the Senate can reach its opinion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will be its own judge of the facts proven, and will not be governed by the opinion of others.

Mr. SIMPSON. I am asking as to those facts whether he did consult with others and who they were.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think that it is legitimate evidence.

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON.) What corporation, to your knowledge, was Mr. Cannon connected with at that time?—A. I never heard that he was connected with any corporation at that time, other than some that were on the Pacific coast.

Q. Will you tell us, please, whether or not any corporation with which he was connected had ever been a litigant in any court with which you were connected?—A. None to my knowledge.

Q. Had you any reason to believe that any corporation with which he was connected would likely be a litigant in your court?—A. Not certainly from the Pacific coast.

Q. Now, will you tell us, please, whether he ever made any suggestion to you, either then or at any precedent time, in favor of any corporation?—A. Mr. Cannon is quite reticent in business matters and never talks them over. He never talked them over with me.

Q. Did he ever make any suggestion——

Mr. Manager STERLING. We object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the counsel insist on that question?

Mr. SIMPSON. No; I will not insist on it, sir. [To the witness:] Who was Edward R. W. Searle? This question, I will say, has reference to article 11.—A. He was the clerk of the district court and of the circuit court of the middle district of Pennsylvania.

Q. Who was J. Butler Woodward?—A. He was the jury commissioner of that district.

Q. What connection, if any, had either of them with the collection of the sum of money which was presented to you when you went to Europe in 1910?—A. None to my knowledge, except as contributors to it.

Q. When did you first learn of an intention to make that contribution to you?—A. About 10 or 15 minutes before the vessel sailed. As I was standing on the deck by my stateroom, Judge A. T. Searle, of Honesdale, who is no relative of Mr.

E. R. W. Searle, pulled out of his pocket a package and handed it to me, saying that these were sailing orders which I was to observe, and that I was not to open the package until I was a couple of days at sea. Mr. E. R. W. Searle was present there, and Mr. Bernhard Moses also—these three. Judge A. T. Searle was the one who spoke.

Q. When did you open the package?—A. After the boat had sailed. I did not wait the two days. I opened it and found that the package contained money. It also was accompanied by a letter.

Q. What knowledge had you that there was to be presented to you anything at the time of the sailing prior to the time to which you refer, 10 or 15 minutes before leaving the dock?—A. I had not the remotest idea.

Q. What knowledge had you, if any, of what there was in the paper prior to the time you opened it after sailing?—A. I did not know.

Q. You have produced here a paper. You say this [exhibiting] is the paper that was contained in that package?—A. That was the paper accompanying the gift.

Mr. SIMPSON. We offer this paper in evidence, and ask to have it marked and read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be marked and read as requested.

The paper was marked "U. S. S. Exhibit UU" and read as follows:

[U. S. S. Exhibit UU.]

APRIL 16, 1910.

DEAR JUDGE: This is a greeting of your appreciative friends of the bar of Lackawanna, in the middle district, wishing you bon voyage.

Rather than fruit, books, or flowers, we trust you will be willing to accept this as our hearts' desire for your pleasure and enjoyment in your more than well-earned outing.

May all happiness attend you and yours.

Willard, Warren & Knapp, O'Brien & Kelly, Watson, Diehl & Watson, Welles & Torrey, Samuel B. Price, R. W. Rymer, M. J. Martin, L. A. Watres, J. Benjamin Dimmick, C. E. Sprout, E. R. W. Searle, A. T. Searle.

(Indorsed: Accompanying the gift of $525 from the bar, on my going abroad, Apr. 16, 1910.)

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON). Who was A. T. Searle?—A. A. T. Searle had been assistant United States attorney for the middle district of Pennsylvania. At the time of this occurrence he had been elected or appointed, I forget which—he was elected finally—president judge of that judicial district of Pennsylvania of which Wayne is one of the counties and Honesdale is the county seat.

Q. What was your relation to the contributors to this fund?—A. It was very close personally and professionally.

Q. How long have you known J. Butler Woodward? I am dealings now with article 12.—A. I have known him for 30 years.

Q. In what way?—A. In the most favorable possible. He is a very fine lawyer and a very sterling man.

Q. Why did you appoint him as jury commissioner?—A. I thought it was the best possible selection that I could make at the time.

Q. What was his standing in the community?—A. The very highest as a lawyer, professionally and personally.

Q. And where did he reside?—A. He lived in Wilkes-Barre.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I send a question to the desk to be propounded to the witness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri presents a question which he desires to have propounded to the witness. It will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the question, as follows:

Were you in any financial distress at the time you accepted the $500 donation?

The WITNESS. I was not. I expected to pay the matters incidental to the trip outside of those which Mr. Cannon took care of, and I did.

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON.) You say Mr. Woodward resided in Wilkes-Barre. That was within the middle district of Pennsylvania, was it not?—A. Yes; it is a short distance from Scranton—about 20 miles.

Q. He continued to reside in the middle district during the time of your incumbency of the office of judge of that district?—A. He did.

Q. What was his politics?—A. He was a Democrat, as his father and grandfather had been before him.

Q. And what was Mr. Searle's politics?—A. Republican.

Q. What did you know, if anything, about Mr. Woodward's railroad connections at the time you appointed him?—A. I did not know that he was a railroad lawyer, as the saying is.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to submit a question to the witness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington presents an inquiry which he desires to have propounded to the witness. The Secretary will read the question.

The Secretary read the question, as follows:

Did Mr. Woodward seek the jury commissionership?

The WITNESS. The jury commissionership sought him. I pressed it upon him as a favor.

Q. (By Mr. WORTHINGTON.) A favor to whom?—A. A favor to me and to the district.

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON.) I turn now to article 13. There has been offered in evidence here a letter, dated August 3, 1911, written by you to Thomas Darling, Esq., introducing Mr. Williams to him. Do you remember the giving of that letter?—A. I do.

Q. Will you state the circumstances attending its giving?—A. Mr. Williams came and spoke about a dump that was controlled by Mr. Darling. I had known of that dump previously, I think; at all events, he said that Mr. John W. Peale, who had had a lease of it, had given up the lease, and he thought Mr. Darling would be willing to lease it to him. I wrote the letter and gave it to Mr. Williams to take to Mr. Darling.

Q. How long had you known Mr. Darling?—A. I had known Mr. Darling ever since he was in college. I think he graduated in 1886. I had know him very closely and intimately; and every Yale reunion there was in that vicinity I think we both of us attended. He belongs to the same college society that I do. I had entertained him at my house.

Q. How long did you say that you had known him?—A. Since he was in college. I think he graduated in 1886, if my memory serves me aright.

Q. That would be about 26 years?—A. Yes; I think about that time.

Q. You both went to the same college?—A. We were both gradutes of Yale.

Q. After this letter was given to Mr. Williams what, if anything, was done by you in relation to it?—A. Nothing whatever. I never heard of it afterwards.

Q. There appears in evidence a letter written by you to Mr. Darling as Exhibit No. 95, found on page 865, in which you ask a reference to the Hollenback culm-dump case. Will you tell us, please, what was referred to in that letter?—A. At some time, I can not tell you when, Mr. Darling and I had a conversation in regard to culm-dump titles. He informed me that there had been a controversy and lawsuit in which he had defended the right of the Hollenback Coal Co. against, I think it was, the Lehigh & Wilkes-Barre Coal Co. He represented one side and his partners represented the other; and he was particularly interested in the matter because he had won the case. It was a case which determined more or less culm-dump titles; and I wrote to him after that interview to get the report in which it could be found.

Q. For what purpose?—A. I simply wanted to know it as a matter of law.

Q. It is stated in article 13 that at divers times and places you, as United States judge, wrongfully sought to obtain credit from and through people who were interested in the result of suits that were pending or had been pending in your court. Will you kindly state the facts in regard to that matter?—A. There are no facts in regard to that matter that I know of.

Q. It is also stated in that article that you were engaged in carrying on a general business for speculation and profit in the purchase of culm dumps, culm lands, and other coal property. What are the facts regarding that?—A. Why, there are no facts with regard to that.

Q. It is also stated in that article that for a valuable consideration you were engaged in endeavoring to compromise litigation pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission. What are the facts touching that?—A. Absolutely there are no facts of that character.

Q. It is also therein stated that you willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly used your influence as a United States judge with the Erie Railroad Co.; the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co.; the Lackawanna & Wyoming Valley Railroad Co.; and other railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce, to induce them to enter into contracts and agreements in which you were financially interested with various persons, without disclosing your interest, but which interest was, in fact, known to the officers and agents of said railroad companies. Tell us, please, what the fact in regard to that is.

Mr. Manager STERLING. We object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that it would be improper to ask the witness whether or not that was true. The Chair also thinks it is competent for counsel to ask the witness what are the facts; in other words, in one case it would be testifying to a conclusion and in the other case it would be testifying to the facts. Counsel can ask what the facts are, and if the witness knows those facts he can say so.

Mr. SIMPSON. I simply have asked what the facts are. That is the question. [To the witness:] State, please, what the facts are in regard to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The witness can state whether or not there are any facts.

The WITNESS. There are no facts that I know of to which that would apply.

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON.) Tell us, please, whether or not at any time you asked anybody or knew of anybody being asked to conceal your connection with any of the matters to which you have testified in this case.—A. Never.

Mr. SIMPSON (to the managers). Cross-examine.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, it is now within 25 minutes of the usual time of adjournment. The witness has been on the stand four hours and the Senate has been in session for five and a half hours or more. The managers suggest that, if it suits the convenience of the Senate, we are perfectly willing that the examination of this witness may be postponed until to-morrow. I may say that the counsel for the respondent themselves suggested to the managers that they thought that course would be proper, and we have agreed that it would be proper.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I move that the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 7, 1913, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, source of life and light and love, mercy, justice, and truth, we wait upon Thee for that divine touch which shall enable us, amid the busy whirl and turmoil of life's activities, to hold our course to Thee and hallow Thy name, that at the close of this day we may lie down to peaceful slumber with the blessed assurance that whether we awake in this world or some other we are Thine, and that Thou wilt care for us there as Thou hast cared for us here. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, January 4, 1913, was read and approved.

JOSEPH W. KING.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I have a resolution which I desire to have read from the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Is it a privileged resolution?

Mr. FOWLER. I think it is, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read it and we will see.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas on the 11th day of December, 1912, the Hon. Walter L. Fisher, Secretary of the Department of the Interior, issued to Capt. Joseph W. King, late captain of Company E, of the One hundred and Twentieth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, but now a guard in the Department of the Interior on a salary of $720 per annum, the following order of suspension:

Mr. JOSEPH W. KING, of Illinois.

SIR: On the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission, dated November 22, you are hereby suspended from duty for two months from January 1, 1913, without salary as a watchman at $720 in the office of the Secretary.

The commission states that its recommendation is the result of its investigation of your recent political activity in writing numerous personal letters soliciting votes for certain candidates for elective office in violation of——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will suspend. The Chair will state to the gentleman that this is not a privileged matter, and that it will have to take the course of ordinary resolutions by going into the basket.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Since the Calendar for Unanimous Consent has been provided, the Chair is precluded from submitting that request. The Chair will take pains to state it over again so that everybody will understand.

Some three or four years ago the House rigged up what is called the Unanimous Consent Calendar. It is not necessary to tell how it happened, but it was done. Last summer there were certain little matters pending here that the Chair thought were of a good deal of public interest, such as public works, and so forth, and one day the Chair started to let gentlemen in with these matters. The Chair thinks yet that he was right about it, but one of the Members of the House objected to the proceeding in a rather vociferous manner, and the Chair announced that after that he would adhere to the rule which he has stated this morning. So this resolution will have to go into the basket and take the usual course.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. It will go into the basket, and the Chair will look into it and confer with the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. Very well, Mr. Speaker.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. This is Unanimous Consent Calendar day, and the Clerk will report the first bill on that calendar.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 25507) to authorize certain changes in homestead allotments of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians in Oklahoma.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that bill be passed over, for the reason that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] is not present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to pass this bill without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, how many times has this bill been passed without prejudice?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think this bill was passed the last time it was up.

Mr. MANN. My impression is that it has been passed over three or four times without prejudice.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] is the author of the bill, and it pertains to Indian affairs in his district.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is usually very wide awake. I am not disposed to object, although I should think that the gentleman might be present on some unanimous-consent day when the bill was reached.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to passing the bill without prejudice?

There was no objection.

ENLARGED HOMESTEADS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 23351) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead."

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I have received a request from the gentleman from Colorado, Mr. TAYLOR, who is sick in a hospital in Colorado, that this bill be passed without prejudice, and I ask unanimous consent that that course be pursued.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, many gentlemen here are very much interested in this legislation and desire that it be passed. I desire to accede to the wishes of the gentleman from Colorado, and still I think the legislation ought to be considered. If the final enactment of the legislation will be assured by letting it go over, of course I shall not object.

Mr. FERRIS. I can only give the gentleman the information that I have received from the gentleman from Colorado, Mr. TAYLOR, that he will be here in the course of a week.

Mr. MONDELL. On the theory that there will be objection made to the bill when it is taken up and that it will be stricken from the calendar, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection that the bill go over without prejudice?

There was no objection.

EXCHANGE OF LANDS FOR SCHOOL SECTIONS IN RESERVATIONS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 25738) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange lands for school sections within an Indian, military, national forest, or other reservation, or for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill by title.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from California if this is not the same bill that I have been compelled to object to several times before?

Mr. RAKER. This bill has many of the features that were in the original bill. This identical bill has already passed the Senate and is now on the Speaker's table. As I say, the features in the bill have been agreed upon by the Secretary of the Interior with the authorities of California and practically all parties concerned, as I am advised. There is nobody here from California making any objection to the matter. This matter was up last session, and after I returned home I took the matter up with the authorities again, and I found that there was quite a strong feeling in favor of the passage of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I would suggest to the gentleman from California that if there is a Senate bill on this subject which has already passed the Senate it might be well to refer it to the committee, have it reported back to the House, and let it go on the Unanimous Consent Calendar so that the House will have some idea of what is intended.

Mr. RAKER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the Committee on Public Lands two weeks ago took up the Senate bill. While the Senate bill was not referred to the committee, I had the bill there and the matter was presented to them, and they unanimously authorized me to have this bill laid aside and to take up the Senate bill and have it passed at such time as the House will hear it.

Mr. MANN. The Members of the House do not have the Senate bill, and there is no opportunity for Members to examine the Senate bill until it is referred and printed. That is just what the gentleman desires now. Here is a House bill differing from the former House bill that was objected to. The Senate has passed the bill, and the gentleman knows what is in the Senate bill, and perhaps the Public Lands Committee may know. I do not know what is in the Senate bill. I prefer to have the Senate bill come up in the regular way. It ought to be referred to the committee and printed.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, my idea was in saving printing on the matter by having the Senate bill take the place of the House bill, as it is the same bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the anxiety of my friend from California to save printing, and he can save it by not inserting in the RECORD some of the matter which he probably intends to on some other subject. That would save enough to print this bill over a number of times.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman insists upon his objection, in order that I may have the Senate bill referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and, as they have already authorized, that I may call up that bill, I ask unanimous consent that for the present this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. If we are going to act on the Senate bill, why not strike this bill off the Calendar for Unanimous Consent?

Mr. RAKER. I think the House ought to have it when the Senate bill comes up, if the Committee on the Public Lands agrees, so that Members may know that my statement now as to the Senate and the House bill is correct. I think that is only fair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from California what the parliamentary status of the Senate bill is.

Mr. RAKER. The Senate bill has passed the Senate and is now on the Speaker's table.

Mr. MANN. And I ask for its reference to the proper committee.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from California say?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I would say that the Committee on the Public Lands has, by unanimous vote, authorized me, when the time comes, to ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be taken up and passed—substituted for the House bill—which request I now most respectfully make.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Illinois say?

Mr. MANN. I shall object to the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois object to this particular bill being passed without prejudice, which is the last request of the gentleman from California, so that the gentleman could get the Senate bill out?

Mr. MANN. I do not object to that request.

The SPEAKER. It is so ordered, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, in that connection may I now ask unanimous consent to call up the Senate bill 5068?

Mr. MANN. O Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California knows perfectly well——

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

BRIDGE ACROSS HUDSON RIVER AT NEW YORK CITY.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 4978) to supplement and amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the North River Bridge Co. and to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches at New York City across the Hudson River, to regulate commerce in and over such bridge between the States of New York and New Jersey, and to establish such bridge a military and post road," approved July 11, 1890.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to incorporate the North River Bridge Co. and to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches at New York City across the Hudson River, to regulate commerce in and over such bridge between the States of New York and New Jersey, and to establish such bridge a military and post road," be, and the same is hereby, so supplemented and amended as to extend the time for the completion of the construction of the bridge by the said act authorized until the 1st day of January, A. D. 1922: Provided, That the location of said bridge and all plans for its construction shall hereafter be submitted to the Secretary of War for his consideration and approval before the construction of said bridge shall be entered upon.

Amend by striking out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That section 2 of the act entitled 'An act to incorporate the North River Bridge Co., and to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches at New York City across the Hudson River, to regulate commerce in and over such bridge between the States of New York and New Jersey, and to establish such bridge a military and post road,' approved July 11, 1890, be, and the same is hereby, so amended as to extend the time for the completion of the said bridge and approaches thereof for 10 years from the date of the approval hereof: Provided, That this act shall not be construed as authorizing the building of said bridge in accordance with plans heretofore approved by the Secretary of War, but drawings showing the location and plans of said structure shall again be submitted to him, for his consideration and approval, before construction shall be entered upon: And provided further, That actual work hereunder and in accordance with such plans so approved must be commenced within three years after the approval of this act, or in default thereof the grantee shall forfeit all rights and privileges hereby and herein granted.

"SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know something about that bill. Notwithstanding the fact that this bill has been reported by my committee, it was done in my absence, and I do not know much about the bill. It is a very important matter, it seems to me, and I would like to know something about this company that desires to construct this bridge.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, the bill is practically to extend the life of the charter of the North River Bridge Co. In 1890 the charter was originally passed by the Fifty-first Congress, and 10 years fixed in it as the time within which to complete the bridge. The bridge is to be over the North River, connecting New York with New Jersey. At the expiration of the 10 years, and in February, 1901, Congress extended the time for completion, and since the bridge has not been completed within the period limited by the last extension, although work upon it was actually begun, the company now seeks another extension.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman inform me how much work has been done upon this bridge in 20 years?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. We have had hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. In those hearings the evidence showed property was, on application by the company, condemned for bridge purposes and considerable work done. Pending the performance of the work questions arose as to the validity of the charter. The matter was carried through the courts, finally to the Supreme Court of the United States. That court held that the charter was valid. Plans were made, and they were approved by the Secretary of War. Work of construction was actually begun. It has become a real public necessity to have such a bridge as the measure contemplates.

Mr. SABATH. This bridge is to be constructed by a private corporation?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. For the benefit of the general public? Does the gentleman know anything about the tolls to be charged on this bridge?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. No; I do not know what tolls are to be charged.

Mr. SABATH. Could the gentleman enlighten the House on what is to be the cost of the bridge?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. It is a very large enterprise, Mr. Speaker, and will require a great deal of capital. I am assured by reliable gentlemen who are interested in the measure, and, among others, by the eminent engineer who appeared before the committee and who is very well informed and an exceedingly skillful man in his profession, that it will take something over $40,000,000. At any rate, it is a very large sum of money, and I am assured and from reliable authority understand if this bill be now passed the company will be able to have the matter properly financed and the work will be at once begun after the War Department shall fix the location as the reported amendment provides and that before the end of the time limited by the amendment proposed by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce the bridge will be completed and ready for public use. The tremendous increase in freight and passenger traffic between New York and New Jersey makes the bridge a great necessity, and the public interests will be subserved and transportation facilitated if the company be given the opportunity under this bill to complete the bridge.

Mr. SABATH. But that does not give——

Mr. HAMILL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILL. Are not negotiations now pending, or rather is not the question of the advisability of building a bridge by the State of New York and the State of New Jersey being considered by a joint committee appointed by the legislatures of those States?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I know there was such a proposition made. How far the commission went I do not know. We were not advised in our committee just how much work the commission did. The commissioners did not appear before our committee. The record is devoid of anything pertaining to the inquiry of the gentleman, so that I can not give a definite reply to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HAMILL. Why did not this corporation build the bridge within the period of the life of their first charter?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. In the first place, the company was delayed in its operations because of the extended litigation, which was finally determined in the company's favor in the Supreme Court of the United States. Then there were, years ago, engineering difficulties which now are overcome. Then, again, there were periods of financial panic and financial depression, which of course delayed the financing of the work. That situation has also passed, and, as I before stated, reliable authority informs me that capital stands ready if this bill be passed. You must bear in mind that the delay incident to the long litigation——

Mr. HAMILL. How was it determined?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. It was determined favorably to the company. Again, it may be said the company was delayed because in years past there was question as to whether such a bridge as is contemplated by the company could be successfully built, but these engineering difficulties have, as I said, been overcome. Engineers of great skill and great reputation now say that such a bridge can be easily built and very well constructed. Conditions have arisen out of the automobile traffic that make such a bridge necessary. This is aside from all other traffic consideration. The McAdoo tunnels, it must be borne in mind, are for local passenger traffic only.

Mr. HAMILL. Would not it be far better to construct this bridge from public funds than from private capital, if it is feasible to construct it?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Well——

Mr. FITZGERALD. That would require an amendment to the constitution of the State of New York; that is my impression.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I think my colleague from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is right. I am inclined, however, to think that that question does not really enter into the discussion here this morning.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to get time to look into this question, and therefore I shall object to its present consideration. I ask that it be laid over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks that this bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. HAMILL. That it be laid over.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman's request be granted, what will then be the status of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It will come up two weeks from to-day and be in the very same condition it is in now.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does the gentleman think he ought to insist upon that this morning? I hope he will not.

Mr. HAMILL. Yes. It is one of immense importance, and we ought to be fully informed about it before we act.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Well, rather than incur the gentleman's displeasure and have an objection noted——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to this bill being passed without prejudice?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

HUDSON RIVER BRIDGE, NEW YORK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 5659) an act to supplement and amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the New York & New Jersey Bridge Cos. to construct and maintain a bridge across the Hudson River between New York City and the State of New Jersey," approved June 7, 1894.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, in order to save time, as this is a similar bill to the one to which objection has just been made, I object to its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky objects, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar.

DAM ACROSS WHITE RIVER, MO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 25035), granting to the Ozark Power and Water Co. authority to construct a dam across White River, Mo.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let the bill be reported.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] intend to object to the bill? If so, it should be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Ozark Power and Water Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Missouri, with principal offices in the city of Joplin, Mo., its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a dam across the White River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, approximately three miles upstream from the towns of Hollister and Branson, in Taney County, Mo., in township 22 north, range 21 west, of the fifth principal meridian, in accordance with the provisions of the act approved June 23, 1910, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate construction of dams across navigable waters,' approved June 21, 1906."

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I have been in consultation somewhat with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL], and it was thought that we might arrive at a conclusion in reference to some amendment that would be offered to this bill, and for the benefit of the House I would like to have the amendment read, which is satisfactory, so far as I am concerned.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment for information.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, one moment. Does the gentleman object to the consideration of the bill? I do not know what the amendment is, but if the gentleman reserves the right to object to have amendments read for the information of the House, it will initiate a practice that will destroy the value of the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that if an amendment could be put on this bill that would safeguard the rights of the Government and the users of the water power, I will have no objection to the consideration of the bill. What I want is that this amendment be read for the information of the House, so that if the gentleman from New York or anyone else objects to it——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object to the reading of the amendment. I do not believe that gentlemen should have the right to reserve the objection in order to have proposed amendments read, and then make their consent dependent upon whether unanimous consent be given to the adoption of the amendment or amendments they propose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] objects to the reading of the amendment. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that this is a matter that is important to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL]. And the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] remembers that there has been some controversy here in reference to granting these water-power sites. And so I desire to take this matter up in this way. Of course, if the gentleman from Missouri——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this is a matter of vital importance, and inasmuch as the amendment that the gentleman proposes, in his opinion, is one that is essential properly to safeguard the interests of the Government and is one of the conditions that the report of the committee states it was unable to incorporate in the bill, then this is not a bill that should be considered by unanimous consent. I do not propose, if I can prevent, making absolutely futile the Calendar for Unanimous Consent by having initiated this practice and having gentlemen occupying time to have proposed amendments read and making their unanimous consent to the bill dependent upon whether unanimous consent be given to the adoption of the amendment they propose. In that way we would deprive this calendar of its usefulness. I shall object to that practice whenever I happen to be here and such a bill is before the House, regardless of what the amendment happens to be.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from New York, no doubt, in his long service in the House can recall to mind that amendments are brought about in this manner, and thereby differences are arranged. While the gentleman may conclude it is unusual practice, I have no doubt that he, as chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations, has had informal arrangements of the same kind. I am not attempting to have any secrecy about this matter, but I wish the House to know my position on this subject. If the gentleman desires to object——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will object to the reading of the amendment before consent is given to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has already objected to the reading of the amendment and that shuts it out.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire simply to say this word in regard to these bills relating to water power. In my judgment, there is no question before Congress of more value or concerning which there is a greater diversity of views. It is manifest that the Unanimous Consent Calendar was to take charge of such matters that there was likely to be no objection to. It was never intended for the consideration of matters that raise questions about which there are strong differences of view. For that reason I shall object not only to this bill, but, if I am present, to any other bill dealing with water-power matters put on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] objects.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman reserve his objection for a moment?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no objection to reserving it; but that is my position, and it is perfectly plain.

Mr. RUSSELL. This bill is altogether different from the other water-power bills pending in this House. Congress has already granted the right to build a dam across this river, and the company that seeks to get this permission now has already expended approximately a million and a half dollars in the building of that dam. This bill simply asks permission to build a supplemental dam for reservoir purposes, so as to regulate the flow of the water at all seasons and to make beneficial and profitable the dam that has already been constructed under the authority of an act of Congress.

We feel that this bill should not be governed by the strict rule that is to be applied by these gentlemen to other bills granting the right, as an original proposition, to build dams. This is a supplementary dam, and it is necessary for the purpose of utilizing the dam that has already been constructed. The prompt passage of this bill is very important to my district and is greatly desired by my constituents. I wish my friend from Kentucky would withdraw his objection and let this bill be considered. I do not think there will be any objection to it after it is submitted to the House and the amendment suggested has been offered and adopted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. I object.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] objects and likewise the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. The bill is stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next one.

DISMISSAL OF CERTAIN WEST POINT CADETS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the resolution (S. J. Res. 99) authorizing the President to reassemble the court-martial which on August 16, 1911, tried Ralph I. Sasse, Ellicott H. Freeland, Tattnall D. Simkins, and James D. Christian, cadets of the Corps of Cadets of the United States Military Academy, and sentenced them.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to reassemble the court-martial, or as many members thereof as practicable, not less than the minimum prescribed by law, which on August 16, 1911, tried Ralph I. Sasse, Ellicott H. Freeland, Tattnall D. Simkins, and James D. Christian, cadets of the Corps of Cadets of the United States Military Academy at West Point, N. Y., for having violated on August 4, 1911, paragraph No. 132 of the former regulations of the said academy, and sentenced them to be dismissed from the service, and to resubmit the case of any one or more of said cadets upon his or their applications to said court for reconsideration of the sentence; and upon such reconsideration the court is authorized to construe said paragraph as not necessarily requiring a sentence of dismissal, but as permitting a lesser punishment, as provided in paragraph No. 142 of the current regulations approved June 15, 1911, and to modify the sentence accordingly; and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to carry such modified sentence or sentences into effect, notwithstanding the prior dismissal of said cadets, by reinstating them in accordance with the terms and conditions of the modified sentence as approved by the President.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker; and I make the point of order, in addition, that this bill, being of a private character, has no place on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I can not hear the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida complains that he can not hear the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that this is a Private Calendar bill, erroneously placed on the House Calendar, and as a Private Calendar bill it can not be placed on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. The rules provide for the three calendars—a Union Calendar, a House Calendar, and a Private Calendar. Paragraph 729, third clause, provides for—

A Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House, to which shall be referred all bills of a private character.

I think it is perfectly apparent to anyone who examines the bill that this is a bill of a private character.

The SPEAKER. Where is the gentleman reading?

Mr. MANN. From page 362 of the Manual, Rule XIII, section 1, clause 3:

A Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House, to which shall be referred all bills of a private character.

This bill is a bill for the relief of gentlemen who were formerly cadets at the Military Academy, and it is purely a bill of a private character, to relieve private individuals.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I want to be heard for just a moment, if the Chair will permit me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, this is not a resolution for the relief of anybody. It is not in its essential characteristics a private measure. If the Speaker will examine the report of the Committee on Military Affairs of this House accompanying this resolution, I think the Speaker will find that a great principle is involved in this resolution, aside from the relief of anybody. The resolution is not entitled a resolution for the relief of any individual, but it is entitled a resolution "authorizing the President to reassemble the court-martial which on August 16, 1911, tried" certain-named individuals then cadets at the West Point Military Academy.

Now, the facts are, Mr. Speaker, that there was a regulation of the Military Academy which provided that no cadet shall drink any spirituous or other intoxicating liquor or bring or cause to be brought within the academy limits or have the same within his room or otherwise within his possession, on the pain of being dismissed the service.

The SPEAKER. The rules provide for three calendars: First, a Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to which shall be referred bills raising revenue, and so forth, of a public nature; second, a House Calendar, to which shall be referred all bills of a public character not raising the revenue and not appropriating money; third, a Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House, to which shall be referred all bills of a private character. Then section 3 of that same rule says:

After a bill which has been favorably reported shall be upon either the House or the Union Calendar—

And a private bill can not be on either one of those calendars—

any Member may file with the Clerk a notice—

And so forth, for the purpose of getting it on to the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the Speaker will just allow me to finish what I was about to say, I think I can show the Speaker wherein this resolution partakes more essentially of a public nature than of a private nature.

I have just stated to the Speaker what the regulation of the Military Academy was which was adopted in 1902. That remained the regulation until June, 1911. This regulation had always been construed by courts-martial to mean the summary dismissal of cadets who violated it. In June, 1911, the department, thinking that was too harsh a rule, modified it by leaving it in the discretion of the court-martial as to what punishment should be inflicted in a given case.

The SPEAKER. Under which regulation were these boys tried?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am coming to that. The court-martial was assembled in August, 1911. These boys were tried on the 16th of August, 1911, and the new regulation did not reach the officials at West Point until August 29, 1911, and that court-martial tried these boys and sentenced them in absolute ignorance of the law which applied to their case. The Secretary of War of the United States said that, in his judgment, this was a matter of so much importance that he consented to this resolution in order that this court-martial might be reconvened and these four American citizens tried again, not for their relief but for the vindication of the law, in order that they might be tried as the law provided at the time the court was assembled and rendered its verdict. So I think it is essentially a matter of a public nature in which the whole United States, and particularly this Congress, are interested. That is all I have to say.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I take it, then, that the bill is referred to the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. It goes to the Private Calendar.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. It appears that the resolution just disposed of is to go to the Private Calendar. At present, in addition to being on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, it is also on the House Calendar. What happens to the resolution as it appears on the House Calendar?

The SPEAKER. It will be stricken from both the House Calendar and the Unanimous Consent Calendar and will go to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, this is a Senate resolution. As it goes off this calendar, would it be proper to ask that the Senate resolution lie on the table?

The SPEAKER. It has already been referred to the committee, and the committee has made a report. It is bound to be upon one of the three calendars. The Clerk will report the next bill.

MEAT INSPECTION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 26329) to amend the proviso in meat-inspection law concerning products prepared according to directions of foreign purchasers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proviso in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907," approved June 30, 1906, which reads as follows: "Provided, That subject to the rules and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, the provisions hereof in regard to preservatives shall not apply to meat-food products for export to any foreign country and which are prepared or packed according to the specifications or directions of the foreign purchaser, when no substance is used in the preparation or packing thereof in conflict with the laws of the foreign country to which said article is to be exported; but if said article shall be in fact manufactured, sold, or offered for sale for domestic use or consumption then this proviso shall not exempt said article from the operation of all the other provisions of this act," be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting after the word "preservatives" the words "and coloring matter," so that said proviso as amended shall read as follows: "Provided, That, subject to the rules and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, the provisions hereof in regard to preservatives and coloring matter shall not apply to meat-food products for export to any foreign country and which are prepared or packed according to the specifications or directions of the foreign purchaser, when no substance is used in the preparation or packing thereof in conflict with the laws of the foreign country to which said article is to be exported; but if said article shall be in fact sold or offered for sale for domestic use or consumption then this proviso shall not exempt said article from the operation of all the other provisions of this act."

With the following amendment:

In line 4, page 2, after the word "fact," insert the word "manufactured."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the author of the bill if it is intended by this amendment to give to meat-packing companies and butterine companies in this country the right to impose upon the people of other countries that which the law does not permit them to impose on the people of this country?

The SPEAKER. Who is the author of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I am the author of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] desires some information concerning it.

Mr. MANN. The bill does not give the right to impose upon the people of other countries what is not authorized in this country, but it authorizes the people of other countries to obtain what the people of those countries could not obtain without this legislation. This is the situation. I discovered a few years ago when making a trip to the West Indies that in some of the islands they use a red-colored butter or oleomargarine. They do not use the yellow butter or the yellow oleomargarine. We have been shipping to Barbados and some of the other islands for a good many years butter and oleomargarine colored with a reddish tinge, and to maintain that color it requires the use of a mineral dye, because the vegetable dye will not keep in that climate.

Recently the Agricultural Department has held that the use of a mineral dye was not permissible, even for export, because the law provides that only for the use of preservatives. Under the existing law they can use preservatives in these articles for export which can not be used for home consumption. The purpose of this bill is to permit them also to use mineral dyes in the preparation of these articles when they are ordered by the persons who order the product. The same law applies to the pure-food act, where we expressly provide that as to articles covered by the pure-food law, if they are prepared in accordance with the custom in the foreign country, certain things can be used which could not be used in this country. The bill would not apply to any article sold or manufactured or offered for sale or for use or consumption in our own country; but if a foreign purchaser orders butter or oleomargarine colored with a reddish dye, they would be permitted to do that. As a matter of fact, I am informed that in these islands where they formerly purchased from the United States our business is now stopped and their purchases are entirely from Europe.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FOWLER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar.

MEMORIAL TABLET TO PENNSYLVANIA SOLDIERS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 22594) permitting the State of Pennsylvania to place a bronze tablet in the corridor of the National Capitol at Washington to the memory of the 530 Pennsylvania soldiers who reached Washington on the 18th day of April, 1861, for the defense of the National Capital.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the custodian of the Capitol be, and he is hereby, authorized to grant a permit to the State of Pennsylvania to place in the corridor of the National Capitol, Washington, at a place to be designated by the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the Senate, and the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House of Representatives, a bronze tablet bearing as inscription the words of a resolution of the Thirty-seventh Congress of the United States, to wit:

XXXVII CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES, AT THE FIRST SESSION.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 22, 1861.

Resolved, That the thanks of this House are due, and are hereby tendered, to the 530 soldiers from Pennsylvania who passed through the mob of Baltimore and reached Washington on the 18th day of April last for the defense of the National Capital.

GALUSHA A. GROW,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Attest:

EM. ETHRIDGE, Clerk.

SEC. 2. That the said bronze tablet to be furnished and the entire cost of its installation to be borne by the State of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas whether he thinks it is desirable to put up an inscription which falsifies the record?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not think it would be desirable to put up an inscription that falsifies the record. Does the gentleman refer to what is omitted?

Mr. MANN. Here is a proposition to put up and recite a resolution of Congress as complete, and then proposes to take out of that resolution a part of it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Where does the report say that the resolution is complete?

Mr. MANN. As I understand the proposition, it proposes to change a bronze tablet which now recites a complete resolution passed by Congress so as to still purport to recite a resolution which, in fact, never was passed by Congress. Does the gentleman think that is a proper way to record history?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will say to the gentleman that I think anything that the Committee on the Library recommends, after a full consideration, is correct. I will say, in further explanation to the gentleman, that the committee thought that as the original resolution contained matter which might have a tendency to continue or revive certain feelings that were developed during the Civil War period which, perhaps, it is wiser should not be revived or continued, they felt justified in recommending that the resolution be passed as amended.

I will say, further, that the resolution in this shape is satisfactory to the gentleman who introduced it—Mr. LEE—and that the committee gave the matter real consideration. They hedged it about with all possible precaution, and determined that it should only be put up when consented to by certain authorities that are named, and not then unless it measures up to a certain artistic standard.

Mr. MANN. As I understand the gentleman, the position of the Library Committee is that it is not desirable to erect this bronze tablet reciting what the resolution actually was because it might revive sectional feeling. The resolution was:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House are due, and are hereby tendered, to the 530 soldiers from Pennsylvania who passed through the mob of Baltimore and reached Washington on the 18th day of April last for the defense of the National Capital.

The only thing of note in connection with that resolution is that it thanks these soldiers for passing through the mob at Baltimore. If there had been no mob at Baltimore and they had not passed through a mob at Baltimore, there was no occasion for the resolution.

It may be desirable not to revive that sectional feeling. I am inclined to think, myself, it is not a wise thing to put in the Capitol a tablet referring to the mob at Baltimore, which did or did not exist; and to put into the Capitol a bronze tablet, leaving out the very essence of the resolution, falsifying the record which actually was made by Congress, seems to me to be a matter of very doubtful propriety, at least.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that my recollection is that those words which the committee recommended should be stricken out of the resolution were not the very essence of it as presented for the consideration of the committee; but the claim was advanced that this was the first military organization that reached the Capital for its defense, and because of the promptness of those men in volunteering their services and the speed with which they arrived in Washington—whether accelerated by dangers on the way I do not know—and being the first military organization that did so, the committee thought that they were entitled to this recognition.

Mr. MANN. They arrived at the Capital first, if they did so, because they were close by. They did not enlist any more quickly than other soldiers did in any other part of the country.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But they got there first.

Mr. GILLETT. But is that correct?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not know. I accepted Pennsylvanians as competent witnesses.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether they got there first or not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the gentleman that these men were known then and are actually known to-day as "First Defenders." They were the men coming out of Pennsylvania who were the first to reach the National Capital for its defense at the call of President Lincoln.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I know that is the claim of Pennsylvanians, and their well-known veracity inclined me to believe that it was correct.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As a rule, Mr. Speaker, Pennsylvanians are not any different from men of Texas or elsewhere in claiming credit for those things actually performed, and in this instance these men did promptly respond to the call, and did reach Washington, and have since been known throughout the country and in all military annals as "First Defenders."

Mr. SLAYDEN. The committee was so convinced.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the principal incident of their trip to Washington was the incident which occurred in Baltimore, which was incorporated in the resolution passed by Congress at that time and which is the substance of the request of the Legislature of Pennsylvania—that this tablet should be placed at the National Capitol. If the gentleman will read the resolution passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, signed by the governor of the State, as it appears on the second page of the report, he will find that that Commonwealth requested that the resolution as passed by Congress back in war times should be incorporated in this tablet, and that resolution is the resolution, it seems to me, that ought to be respected in this instance. It is the resolution which states a historical fact and which the people of Pennsylvania and these good old soldiers—the few who are remaining of the first defenders—desire in their declining days to have placed here as a permanent memorial of their having reached the Capital first. The tablet should state the facts.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. On what date in April was it that they reached Washington?

Mr. SLAYDEN. The 18th of April, I think.

Mr. GILLETT. Was it not the 17th that the Sixth Massachusetts passed through Baltimore?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will say to the gentleman that this is a statement of facts given us by Pennsylvanians:

These troops left their respective homes for Harrisburg, the place designated for the assembling of the first Pennsylvanians to take the field. On the morning of the 18th of April, 1861, after being sworn into the service of the United States, these five Pennsylvania companies left by train for Washington, arriving at 6 o'clock in the evening of that day, three days after the call went forth, and were escorted to the Capitol by order of the Secretary of War.

Mr. KENDALL. What does the record show as to the facts?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I must confess to the gentleman that I have never looked it up. I am letting the Pennsylvanians write their history, as Massachusetts has written hers, very largely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would not the gentleman let the history remain as it was written and not change it at this late date, after half a century has passed since these men came down here?

Mr. SLAYDEN. My friend from Pennsylvania makes the statement that they were the first to arrive, does he?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is historically correct, as I am informed, that these were the first defenders of the National Capital, the men who first arrived at the call of Lincoln, when he feared the Capital might fall.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask my colleague from Texas if he does not think this would be a dangerous proceeding at this late day, 45 years or more from the Civil War, in view of the fact that Congress has always refrained from putting statues and pictures in this Capitol to commemorate any event of this nature for the reason stated so well by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]? I think it is a very unwise move to make at the present time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I think, Mr. Speaker, my colleague is mistaken in his statement that Congress has refrained from doing that sort of thing. If he will walk out into the room we commonly refer to as Statuary Hall he will see some evidences perhaps not as apparent to him as this.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

COMMISSION IN REGARD TO FEDERAL PRISONERS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 21594) to appoint a commission to consider and report upon the general subject of the treatment of juvenile and first offenders, together with the best system of detention of Federal prisoners.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21594) to appoint a commission to consider and report upon the general subject of the treatment of juvenile and first offenders, together with the best system of detention of Federal prisoners.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, who is necessarily detained at the other end of the Capitol, and I ask that this bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] asks that this bill be passed without prejudice on account of the necessary absence of the author in the discharge of an important public duty.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will pardon me, I understood a short time ago there was at least some thought on the part of the Committee of the House on Expenditures in the Department of Justice to investigate United States penitentiaries, and possibly other jails in which Federal prisoners were confined. I do not know whether it is intended to proceed with that, but that will probably be a more——

Mr. HOUSTON. I did not understand what the gentleman stated.

Mr. MANN. Such a proposition will probably be of more value to the House, so far as legislation is concerned, than the appointment of a commission whose report somebody might read.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the matter may go over and let the gentleman from Alabama have an opportunity to explain it.

Mr. MANN. I shall not object to the request, but I call attention to this in the hope that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL], chairman of that committee, might have his attention attracted to this bill. I doubt whether it has been.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to passing this bill without prejudice? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

COAL MINING COMPANIES, OKLAHOMA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3843) granting to the coal mining companies in the State of Oklahoma the right to acquire additional acreage adjoining their mine leases, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 3843. An act granting to the coal mining companies in the State of Oklahoma the right to acquire additional acreage adjoining their mine leases, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill may also be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks that this bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. What bill is it?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is Senate 3843.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman for what purpose he desires to pass the bill without prejudice?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand from certain quarters there will be objection. The committee has passed the bill. It is a Senate bill, and it has been reported from our committee unanimously; and I think the bill should become a law; but, owing to the fact that some of the coal-mining corporations are interested in it and there are some objections, I think they will be obviated if the bill be passed over for two weeks.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to attract the attention of gentlemen who are interested in this bill to the fact that section 2, which is the repealing clause of the bill, would, I am inclined to think, if passed, repeal a great deal more than is contemplated. As far as the bill itself is concerned, if it becomes a law and it repeals anything——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will permit it to go over, the committee will meet on Friday and will amend it.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will look up that. I looked up the law which this apparently purports to repeal and it seems to cover a great deal more than is intended to be repealed.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The reason I ask that it be passed without prejudice is that we can present an amendment to cover objections to the bill. We are very desirous of having the legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to passing this bill without prejudice?

There was no objection.

INDIAN TRIBAL FUNDS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 46) to amend section 2 of an act approved March 2, 1907, entitled "An act providing for the allotment and distribution of Indian tribal funds."

The bill was read in full.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LITTLETON in the chair). Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 25106) to incorporate the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America.

The bill was read in full.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I am going to object to the consideration of this bill. I do not think we have any power to pass it or a similar one. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] also asked me to state that he would enter an objection to it if he were present.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I want to state in connection with this bill that it was up once before and was passed at my request, but I have learned from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and also from the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] that there are objections to its consideration on this calendar which are insuperable. So I am willing that it go back on the calendar, where it can be fought out.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] reserve his objection for one moment, so that I may ask him one question?

Mr. BARTLETT. I am perfectly willing to reserve my objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to know if the gentleman's objection is based on the ground that Congress has no power to grant this sort of a charter?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; that is one of the objections which I have to offer.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

VETERINARY SERVICE, UNITED STATES ARMY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 16843) to consolidate the veterinary service, United States Army, and to increase its efficiency.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the substitute reported by the Committee on Military Affairs may be read instead of the original bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the reading of the substitute, as requested by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY]?

There was no objection.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint veterinarians and assistant veterinarians in the Army, not to exceed 2 such officers for each regiment of Cavalry and Field Artillery, 15 as inspectors of horses and mules and as veterinarians in the Quartermaster's Department, and 5 as inspectors of meats for the Subsistence Department, not to exceed 62 in all.

SEC. 2. That hereafter a candidate for appointment as assistant veterinarian must be a citizen of the United States between the ages of 21 and 27 years, a graduate of a recognized veterinary college or university, and that he shall not be appointed until he shall have passed a satisfactory examination as to character, physical condition, general education, and professional qualifications.

SEC. 3. That an assistant veterinarian appointed under section 2 of this act shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of second lieutenant, mounted; that after five years of service an assistant veterinarian shall be promoted to the rank, pay, and allowances of first lieutenant, mounted: Provided, That he passes a satisfactory examination under such rules as the President may prescribe as to professional qualifications and adaptability for the mounted service; or, if found deficient, he shall be discharged from the Army with one year's pay and have no further claim on the Government.

SEC. 4. That the veterinarians of Cavalry and Field Artillery now in the Army, together with such of the veterinarians of the Quartermaster's and Subsistence Departments provided for in section 1 of this act, now employed, who at the date of the approval of this act shall have less than five years of service, be reappointed and commissioned as assistant veterinarians, with the rank, pay, and allowances of second lieutenant, mounted; that the veterinarians who have over five years of service be reappointed and commissioned as veterinarians, with the rank, pay, and allowances of first lieutenant, mounted: Provided, That they pass a prescribed practical professional examination and a physical examination as to fitness for mounted field service: Provided further, That veterinarians now in the Army and in the employ of the Quartermaster's Department and the Subsistence Department who fail to pass the prescribed physical examination, due to disability incident to the service, and who have been incapacitated from rendering satisfactory service to the Government, shall be retired from active service with 75 per cent of the pay corresponding to length of service as prescribed herein.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of War, upon recommendation of the Quartermaster General, may appoint, for such time as their services may be required, such number of reserve veterinarians as may be necessary to attend public animals pertaining to the Quartermaster's or other departments or corps, who shall have the pay and allowances of second lieutenant, mounted, during such period of service and no longer: Provided, That such reserve veterinarians be graduates of a recognized veterinary college or university and have previously passed such moral, professional, and physical examination as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of War for the proper performance of their duties in mounted field service.

SEC. 6. Candidates passing the examinations as prescribed in section 2 of this act shall be appointed, in the order of merit in which they passed such examinations, to vacancies as they occur, such appointment to be a probationary one of six months, after which time, if the services of the probationer have been satisfactory, he shall be permanently appointed, with commission antedated to embrace such probationary service. Probationary veterinarians whose services are found unsatisfactory shall be discharged at any time during the probationary period, or at the end thereof, without further claim against the Government.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of War is authorized to appoint a board of examiners to conduct the examinations prescribed herein, one member of which shall be a field officer, one a surgeon, and two veterinarians.

SEC. 8. That all laws or parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and are hereby, repealed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the substitute?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to inquire of the chairman of the committee in charge of this bill if there are not now a set of horse doctors in connection with the Army who go everywhere the Army goes?

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that there are now veterinarians in the Army, but they occupy a position which does not give them opportunity to properly take care of the animals under their charge. And I would say to my friend from Illinois that the profession of veterinary surgery is one which has increased in importance and ability, and that veterinary surgeons are now men of excellent education and broad ideas, and the limitations of the service are such that the best veterinarians can not now be obtained for the Army, and will not be obtained, unless something is done in order to give them some standing in the Army. That is the purpose of this bill.

Mr. FOWLER. But these gentlemen are paid a salary now, are they not?

Mr. HAY. They are; yes. They are paid a salary, and those attached to the Cavalry and Field Artillery are placed on the retired list after a certain length of service.

Mr. FOWLER. What salary do they get now?

Mr. HAY. They get the salary of second lieutenant, $1,700 a year, with increase of pay for every five years which they serve.

Mr. FOWLER. And they are retired at what age on what salary?

Mr. HAY. Sixty-four years; or sooner, if they have incurred any physical disability in the line of duty.

Mr. FOWLER. And at what salary are they retired?

Mr. HAY. At three-fourths of the pay they are receiving when retired.

Mr. FOWLER. Will this bill increase the salary of these doctors?

Mr. HAY. It will increase the cost of this service $31,376 per annum.

Mr. FOWLER. Will it increase the salary? Does it provide for an increase of salary?

Mr. HAY. Exactly. That is what I said. It increases the combined salaries of all the veterinarians included in this bill by $31,376 per annum.

Mr. FOWLER. There are no wars now in the United States or elsewhere, where the United States Army is called, and why should we have an increase in time of peace?

Mr. HAY. We are not increasing the number of veterinarians. It is not a war measure. If we had a war we would probably ask for a great many more veterinarians, and a great many more would have to be provided. This bill is intended to increase the efficiency of the veterinary service of the Army.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not true that the salary is sufficient now to get the best horse doctors that can be had?

Mr. HAY. It is not a matter of salary so much as the fact that these men have not the status in the Army which gives them authority to carry out what they believe to be the best plans for the care of the animals which come under their charge.

Mr. FOWLER. Then, why increase the salary if you can get good men for the salary now paid?

Mr. HAY. I have just said that you could not get the best men in the veterinary profession on account of the fact that they have not the standing in the Army that they ought to have—the standing that the dental surgeons have.

Mr. FOWLER. Have any gentlemen declined these positions when tendered to them that the gentleman knows of?

Mr. HAY. These positions are not tendered to them, so far as I know. That is not the way they are given out. The Government does not go around and ask people to take those positions.

Mr. FOWLER. How does a man get the position if it is not tendered to him?

Mr. HAY. He applies for it just as the gentleman himself applies to his constituents when he asks that he be sent to Congress.

Mr. FOWLER. They usually get what they want, don't they?

Mr. HAY. Not always. I will say to the gentleman further, that this measure has been pending for many years, and has been recommended by the War Department as essential for the proper development of this service.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman really think it is necessary that this bill should pass?

Mr. HAY. I do; otherwise I would not be trying to get it passed.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman think it would better prepare the United States Army for battle and the preservation of mules and horses?

Mr. HAY. I do; that is, it would prepare the animals used by the United States Army for battle; yes. I think it will save as much or more by the more expert treatment that animals would be given than the increase of salary will place upon the Government.

Mr. FOWLER. Well, it has been reported that the United States has lost a good many mules recently, because of the inefficiency of the veterinarians who have been in charge of this department of the Army. Now, is that true? Has the gentleman any information upon that question?

Mr. HAY. I have information which appears in the hearings had before the Committee on Military Affairs, to the effect that the veterinarians who are now in the Army are unable to have their commands or orders carried out in respect to the treatment of the horses and mules under their control. Having no status as officers, they are not able to get the men to carry out their orders.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman really think that if this bill should pass it will save the United States more money in the way of saving the lives of mules and horses than the increase of salary that is proposed by the bill?

Mr. HAY. Well, I could not guarantee that, but I believe that it will have that effect. I believe that the service will be so much improved that the animals will be better taken care of, and fewer of the animals will be lost on account of neglect than are lost now.

Mr. FOWLER. Then, Mr. Speaker, on the assurance of the gentleman of the improvement in the service and the great saving of life among mules and horses, I desire to withdraw my objection.

Mr. DIFENDERFER. You should include in that improvement along the line of human beings also.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I want to call the attention of the Chair to line 12, page 6, that part of the bill which provides for the retirement of veterinarians now in the service who fail to pass the prescribed physical examination, where their failure to pass the physical examination is due to disability incident to the service. Is that the term ordinarily used to warrant retirement with three-fourths pay—"incident to the service"?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Not "disability incurred in the service"?

Mr. HAY. Incident to it, I understand.

Mr. MONDELL. There is a great deal of difference between a disability incurred in the service and a disability that might be incident to the service. As a matter of fact, that term might have a very wide application.

Mr. HAY. I understand that in order to obtain retirement for disability, that disability must be brought about incident to the service; that is, it must have happened in the service and must have happened from something which was being done by the person while in the service.

Mr. MONDELL. Is that the language you ordinarily employ in that connection? Is not the provision generally "disability incurred in the service and in line of duty"?

Mr. HAY. I do not think the word is "incurred," but if that suits the gentleman better I shall be very glad to amend the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. I have a very high regard for the members of the Military Committee and for its chairman and for their knowledge of military affairs. If this is the usual term used in cases of this sort, I shall not suggest any change; but my recollection was that ordinarily other language was used, and that the right to receive retired pay based on disability applied only in cases where that disability was incurred in the service and in the line of duty. The term "incident to the service" is a very broad one. If it is the term employed generally in military affairs, I shall not object.

Mr. HAY. I think that is the usual word, but I will offer an amendment at the proper time, using the word "incurred."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. In the line of duty.

Mr. HAY. In the line of duty.

Mr. MONDELL. "Incurred in the service and in the line of duty" I think is the term more frequently used.

Mr. HAY. I do not know that there is any special term used, but if the gentleman thinks that will safeguard it more than the language used in the bill——

Mr. MONDELL. I think it would rather limit it.

Mr. HAY. I will offer it when it is reached, because I want to safeguard that as much as the gentleman does.

Mr. MONDELL. I realize that. This provides for certain classes of veterinarians who are to have the pay and allowances of certain officers mounted. It does not provide for any officials of high rank. Does the chairman of the Military Committee think the passage of this legislation would not lead to the introduction and the pressing of other legislation asking for the appointment of a number of officers of high rank at the head of this new organization.

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman that this is not a staff organization at all. These veterinarians are to be attached to the Cavalry and Field Artillery, and 20 of them are to be used as inspectors of meats, and so forth, in the Quartermaster Corps, and there is no staff about it. There is no bureau proposed or anything of that kind. The bill as originally introduced provided for that, but the committee were careful to eliminate everything of that sort from the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not have time to read the original bill, and I am glad to have the information from the chairman that the bill as originally introduced provided for just what I have suggested.

Mr. CANNON. Did it provide for major generals?.

Mr. MONDELL. Is not this what will happen? The committee have not recommended what the advocates of this legislation have been endeavoring for 20 years to obtain, namely, legislation to give veterinarians actual military rank and hence added dignity and social advancement; to put shoulder straps on them so that when you salute a captain you will not know whether he received his shoulder straps for heroic action in a charge or by curing a corn on the foot of the charger of the colonel of the regiment. The committee have eliminated some of the fuss and feathers which the gentlemen who have long advocated something of this sort have proposed; but you have laid the foundation for it. Now, will it not be urged in the near future that the foundation has been laid for it, and that the further legislation ought to be enacted? The report of the committee quotes approvingly from monarchical military customs.

Mr. HAY. I do not think the report quotes that approvingly. It simply shows what has been done in other armies.

Mr. MONDELL. I realize that. We are now about to take the first step, and it is inevitable——

Mr. HAY. I can state a case in point. The gentleman from Wyoming was on the Committee on Military Affairs for a good many years, and knows that there was an effort made for some years before it was put into effect to establish a Dental Corps in the Army. That bill providing for a Dental Corps passed eight or nine years ago, and that Dental Corps has never developed into anything except what it was in the first place. Members of that corps—I call it a corps, but it is not, because they are distributed to different posts throughout this country, Hawaii, and the Philippines—the same objection was made then to giving these dental surgeons rank as the gentleman now makes to giving the veterinarians rank. The Dental Corps has not received anything more than they had at the beginning, except, I believe, that they have the rank and pay of a first lieutenant. I do not believe that the enactment of this law will be followed by any effort on the part of these men to have themselves increased in rank, or to have a bureau in the War Department for veterinary surgeons.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Virginia, with his wide knowledge and experience in military affairs, does not think that this is a step which is very likely to lead to the other step, which I assume he does not approve of—establishing a corps or bureau, or whatever you call it, with a lot of high offices?

Mr. HAY. I do not. I will say to my friend, who knows as much about military affairs as I do and is much more familiar with the Army than I am, that this bill stands on its own merits. The purpose of it is to give to veterinarians some authority by which they can discharge more efficiently the duties which they have to perform in the Army. Now, if they come in the future and ask for more rank or to have a bureau, or anything of that kind, let the Congress at that time, whenever it may occur, take care of that situation. I do not believe that we ought to defeat a meritorious bill because possibly at some future time somebody may ask for more than we now think they ought to have.

Mr. TILSON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. Could we not obviate that, or the tendency in that direction, by now placing these veterinarians in the Medical Corps, as we did in the case of the dental surgeons? If we leave them as they are in this bill, we leave them orphans, as far as the Army is concerned.

Mr. HAY. The bill provides that there shall be two veterinarians in each regiment of Cavalry and each regiment of Field Artillery, and besides that 20 veterinarians attached to the Quartermaster Corps. These 20 veterinarians would come under the Chief of the Quartermaster Corps, and could not by any possibility be construed into having the status of a corps or a bureau. I hope my friend from Wyoming will realize the importance of this measure. Personally it is nothing to me. I am only advocating it because I believe it is for the interest of the Army and for the service that these men should be given what this bill provides for.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman recall offhand the increase of pay per man this bill provides for?

Mr. HAY. The whole increase would be $31,376 a year. Some of them would be paid as first lieutenants and some as second lieutenants, while all are now paid as second lieutenants.

Mr. MONDELL. Are they paid as second lieutenants mounted?

Mr. HAY. There is no difference under the law now between the pay of a lieutenant mounted and unmounted.

Mr. MONDELL. I am not disposed to object to the bill. I have, I believe, objected to the consideration by unanimous consent of but one bill in my service here. I should, however, object to the consideration of the bill if I thought that this was legislation leading to the creation of a bureau or of a corps with high officials and independent status. If it is simply a measure to increase the efficiency, and if it is necessary to increase the efficiency of the veterinaries, I have no objection to it. I am in favor of any act that will increase efficiency.

Mr. HAY. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. MONDELL. One more suggestion. I certainly would object to the passage of the bill without full consideration if I thought there was any probability that when the bill came before the House it would contain the very objectionable features to which I have referred, with a good deal of influence behind it.

Mr. HAY. So far as I am concerned, the bill will not again come before the House containing the objectionable features to which he has referred. The bill reported from the Military Committee shows that the committee was opposed to creating a corps or bureau.

Mr. MONDELL. Emphatically?

Mr. HAY. Emphatically.

Mr. MONDELL. Unanimously?

Mr. HAY. Unanimously, as far as I know, and the only purpose of the bill was to give these people authority over the men they have to control and for the purpose of making a career for these veterinarians who go into the Army. The best veterinarians will not go into the Army. You can not get them into the Army under the present conditions.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. Would the chairman of the committee object to making an amendment placing these veterinarians in the Medical Corps, and if so, what would the objection be?

Mr. HAY. I would object to that, because the veterinarians deal with the animals of the Army, and the Chief of the Quartermaster Corps has control of a very large number of those animals and he ought to have some of these veterinarians at his command. The other veterinarians—those attached to the Cavalry and the Field Artillery—would be under the control of the commanding officer of the regiment to which they may be attached, and I see no reason why we should put these under the Medical Corps.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman propose to add them as additional staff officers on the staff of the colonel, for instance?

Mr. HAY. Not at all. They are simply attached as veterinarians, as the bill provides.

Mr. TILSON. Why would it not be better to put them in the Medical Corps and then assign them as the surgeons are assigned to the various regiments?

Mr. HAY. That matter was gone over fully in the committee, as the gentleman will recall, and the committee thought it would be unwise to do that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The effect of the passage of this bill will be to give a military status to the veterinarians?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Just as it has been given to the dentists?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows that sooner or later we may be confronted with the question of civil-service pensions, and that the subject is being very much agitated throughout the country to-day, especially in the Federal departments.

Mr. HAY. I do not see what this has to do with civil pensions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am going to ask the gentleman a question. I am in sympathy with the spirit of this bill if it gives veterinarians a military status, which I understand it does.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But, following up the question of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] with regard to the language of the bill on page 6, where reference is made to disability incident to service, I would like to ask the gentleman how he interprets this line:

And who have been incapacitated from rendering satisfactory service to the Government.

Suppose one of these veterinarians should become insane?

Mr. HAY. He would be treated just like any other Army officer is treated when he becomes insane while in the service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But suppose while not in the service he should become insane or otherwise incapacitated?

Mr. HAY. If he is not in the service he would have no status.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He would not have a retirement status?

Mr. HAY. No. I will say to the gentleman that veterinarians have retired pay now. They have the privilege now of being put upon the retired list.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand. I am for the bill, but I wanted to know whether we were introducing any new language here, language different from that used in the bill, which provides retirement for these dental surgeons, for instance?

Mr. HAY. Not at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is no change in the language?

Mr. HAY. No.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. I think we ought to go into committee on this bill.

Mr. HAY. Very well. I withdraw the request.

On motion of Mr. HAY the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16843) to consolidate the veterinary service, United States Army, and to increase its efficiency, with Mr. CLARK of Florida in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16843) to consolidate the veterinary service, United States Army, and to increase its efficiency.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for the reading of the substitute offered by the committee.

Mr. MANN. That has already been read. I suggest that the gentleman ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of it, as it has already been read.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to make any remarks, and I would like to have the bill read for amendment unless somebody desires to ask some questions.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. I notice in reference to that language in the bill on page 6:

That veterinarians now in the Army and in the employ of the Quartermaster's Department and the Subsistence Department who fail to pass the prescribed physical examination, due to disability incident to the service, and who have been incapacitated from rendering satisfactory service to the Government, shall be retired, etc.

I would like to ask, first, whether that is a proper description of the existing departments, Quartermaster's Department——

Mr. HAY. No; I am going to offer an amendment to change that.

Mr. MANN. That is what I supposed. I have before me the bill H. R. 23627, reported from the gentleman's committee, that is in reference to examination of line officers and medical officers, where I think in this language probably no change is made in the main. This is in relation to line officers below the rank of major:

If the officer fails in the physical examination and is found incapacitated for service by reason of physical disability contracted in the line of duty.

That language is used twice in reference to line officers, and in the section of the bill in reference to the Medical Corps is the language:

But if he is found disqualified by reason of physical disability incurred in the line of duty.

I take it the intention is to put either of those officers, as far as that is concerned, on the same footing?

Mr. HAY. Yes. I will have no objection to agreeing to an amendment and using that language. Now, I will say to the gentleman that the language—applies, as I understand it, to three veterinarians attached to the Quartermaster Corps and now in the service who are over 70 years of age, and who have been veterinarians for over 40 years, and that language was placed there for the purpose of taking care of those men.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the language remaining in so far as I am concerned, because I do not pretend to be an expert in reference to such matters; but, recalling the language in the other bill, I looked it up. What provision is there in this bill for not retiring these officers, but dismissing them?

Mr. HAY. Well, any officer of the Army can be dismissed who has been guilty of any——

Mr. MANN. I mean for lack——

Mr. HAY. You can not dismiss an officer of the Army except by court-martial.

Mr. MANN. Oh, an officer of the Army who does not pass the examination is dismissed.

Mr. HAY. Oh, yes. The gentleman means the provision of law which provides that when an officer is sent up for promotion and fails to pass the examination he is discharged, with one year's pay.

Mr. MANN. Yes; the man must be able to pass the examination or he is dismissed.

Mr. HAY. With one year's pay. Now, that is a general provision of law.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman may say discharged; I should say he is dismissed from the Army.

Mr. HAY. He is discharged, but the effect is the same. That law is the general law which applies to all officers of the Army——

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether this would.

Mr. HAY. Who are brought up for promotion.

Mr. MANN. There is a separate provision of law for the Medical Corps.

Mr. HAY. Yes; that is the only exception I know of.

Mr. MANN. Well, that might apply possibly to these officers; and if so, then there is no use of putting that provision in the bill in reference to men who do not pass the physical examination, because that is in the existing law.

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman will look on page 5, section 3, he will see the language of the proviso; that is when he comes up for promotion to first lieutenant:

Provided, That he passes a satisfactory examination under such rules as the President may prescribe as to professional qualifications and adaptability for the mounted service; or, if found deficient, he shall be discharged from the Army with one year's pay and have no further claim on the Government.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but that does not cover what I am asking about. Suppose he can not pass a physical examination?

Mr. HAY. Then he can not get in.

Mr. MANN. He is already in, and he comes up for promotion. Suppose he can not pass a physical examination because of disability not incurred in the line of duty?

Mr. BUTLER. He is dismissed.

Mr. MANN. There is no provision here to do it. That is what I am trying to find out. The only provision I find in the bill—and I will be glad to be corrected if I am wrong—is if he can not pass an examination because of the service, then he shall be retired. Suppose he can not pass an examination because of other disabilities?

Mr. HAY. That only applies to veterinarians now in the Army. It does not apply to those who are to come in hereafter.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, any officer in the Army—and these men will become officers if this bill becomes a law—who is found physically disqualified for continuing in the service is retired.

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Any Army officer?

Mr. MANN. No, sir; it must be physical disability incurred in the line of duty.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The presumption is——

Mr. MANN. There is no presumption in the law or in the fact.

Mr. SLAYDEN. As a matter of fact, all officers in the Army are examined for physical fitness when they go in, are they not? And when it comes to promotion, if they are found physically unfit, they are discharged?

Mr. HAY. They are not always discharged. They are retired with pay.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have known it to happen.

Mr. KAHN. There was a provision in the last appropriation bill which holds up their pay if they are suffering from disabilities not incurred in the line of duty.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is vicious.

Mr. HAY. I am calling the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to the fact that this bill provides that examinations shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War or the President—I do not recall which now—and, of course, the physical part of the examination is just as much to be required as the mental part of the examination, and section 2 of the bill provides that they shall not be appointed unless they shall have passed a satisfactory examination as to character, physical condition, general education, and professional qualification.

Mr. MANN. I see no way under the bill, I will say to the gentleman, of getting an officer out of the Army under this provision if he is a veterinary officer for physical disability now incurred in line of duty or incident to the service.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman that when we reach that section, on line 16, after the word "satisfactory," I will offer an amendment inserting the words "mental and physical." It will then read:

Provided, That he passes a satisfactory mental and physical examination.

Mr. MANN. Let me ask the gentleman one more question. There is a provision, on page 6, in section 4, which refers to veterinarians now in the Army, and so forth, who have failed to pass the prescribed physical examination. I suppose the purpose of that is to apply only to the first physical examination?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That is not intended to apply either to the physical examination taken 20 years from now of some young officer?

Mr. HAY. You will observe that section 4 provides that the veterinarians of the Cavalry and Field Artillery and the others now employed who at the date of the approval of this act shall have less than five years' service shall be reappointed and commissioned as assistant veterinarians, with the rank, pay, and allowances of second lieutenant, mounted; and that veterinarians who have over five years of service shall be reappointed and commissioned as veterinarians with the rank, pay, and allowances of first lieutenant, mounted. So that all these men now in the Army when they come up for examination will have to stand a physical examination; and by amending section 3, as I suggested to the gentleman a moment ago, it would apply to the men in the Army who go in as second lieutenants and who come up afterwards for promotion to first lieutenancies.

Mr. MANN. This section now applies to those who go into the service under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. HAY. And getting rid of all men now unfit for duty who are now in the service. There are three over 70 years of age.

Mr. MANN. I take it, then, that the language is well advised, and should not refer to disability incurred in the line of duty.

Mr. HAY. It only applies to the men who are now in the Army.

Mr. MANN. Who have been in 40 years?

Mr. HAY. Only as veterinarians.

Mr. MANN. And does not refer to the three actual cases?

Mr. HAY. They are taken care of under the language:

And who have been incapacitated from rendering actual service to the Government.

The gentleman's colleague, Mr. FOWLER, wanted to ask me a question, I believe.

Mr. MANN. Go ahead.

Mr. FOWLER. I desired to inquire as to the difference made between those who are candidates for these positions in section 2 and those who are already in the service in section 4. In section 2 the qualifications which are subject to examination are character, physical condition, general education, and professional qualifications. Now, the examination required of those who are in the service are a prescribed practical professional examination and a physical examination as to fitness for mounted field service. Why should not the examination of those who are already in the service extend to character and education?

Mr. HAY. Well, it does extend to education, because it says "a prescribed practical professional examination." But I am perfectly willing to insert the same provision as in the other section.

Mr. FOWLER. Why not the "character," also?

Mr. HAY. I say I am willing to do that.

Mr. FOWLER. All right. Now, when they are dismissed, it is on examination, beginning on line 11—

Who fail to pass the prescribed physical examination due to disability incident to the service.

Why not go further than that and get rid of those, if any, who may be incompetent because of their unfitness in character and education and in professional qualifications?

Mr. HAY. That is provided for, beginning in line 6, under that proviso, "That they pass a prescribed practical professional examination and a physical examination as to fitness for mounted field service." Now, if the gentleman desires to insert the word "character," I would be willing to do that.

Mr. FOWLER. "Education and character."

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Then there seems to be no way to get rid of those men unless they are deficient through disability incurred in the regular line of military service.

Mr. HAY. And unfit professionally.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not get that meaning from the reading. It says:

Provided further, That veterinarians now in the Army and in the employ of the Quartermaster's Department and the Subsistence Department who fail to pass the prescribed physical examination due to disability incident to the service, and who have been incapacitated from rendering satisfactory service to the Government, shall be retired from active service with 75 per cent of the pay corresponding to length of service as prescribed herein.

I do not quite see that the bill is specific enough to get rid of those who might be deficient otherwise than through disability contracted in the regular line of military duty.

Mr. HAY. They would have to pass a professional examination as well as a physical examination in order to get in as second lieutenants or first lieutenants, either one. But if the gentleman desires it, when we reach that section under the five minute rule, I would be very glad to consider any amendment that the gentleman might think would cure what he thinks ought to be cured.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, if I understand this section, it deals with promoting those of the grade of second lieutenant to the rank of first lieutenant, and if the men really are not efficient the bill would leave those who are in now in the rank of second lieutenant without any provision for retirement if they are incompetent.

Mr. HAY. Some of them would be second lieutenants and some would be first lieutenants.

Mr. FOWLER. And there is no way to get rid of them if they are incompetent otherwise.

Mr. HAY. Oh, yes. If they can not pass a proper professional and physical examination they will be gotten rid of.

Mr. FOWLER. But they will be promoted to first lieutenants if they do pass the examination provided in section 4.

Mr. HAY. Those who served five years will be promoted. Those who served under five years will be given only the rank of second lieutenant.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not quite see where you have authority to get rid of those who might not be competent—not saying that any of them are—except those who have incurred a disability in the regular line of duty.

Mr. HAY. Except that they can not be appointed to these positions unless they pass a prescribed professional examination and a physical examination.

Mr. FOWLER. That is, to promote them to first lieutenants.

Mr. HAY. No; if they do not pass the examination they cease to be members of the Veterinary Corps.

Mr. FOWLER. It says:

That the veterinarians who have over five years of service be reappointed and commissioned as veterinarians with the rank, pay, and allowances of first lieutenant, mounted.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. With a proviso as to the qualifications for the examination.

Mr. HAY. Yes; if they do not pass the examination, then they will not be admitted.

Mr. FOWLER. Your bill does not say so, does it?

Mr. HAY. It says, provided they pass the prescribed professional examination.

Mr. FOWLER. Then they are to pass from the position of second lieutenant to that of first lieutenant.

Mr. HAY. No; none of them are either first or second lieutenants now. They simply draw the pay and have the allowances of a second lieutenant.

Mr. FOWLER. I understand that.

Mr. HAY. They do not occupy the rank.

Mr. FOWLER. I understand that.

Mr. HAY. Therefore if a man has served more than five years, in order that he may come in under this law and be a first lieutenant, a veterinarian must pass this prescribed physical and professional examination. If he does not pass it, he does not get any rank at all. He goes out.

Mr. FOWLER. That is, he does not get the rank of first lieutenant.

Mr. HAY. He does not get any rank.

Mr. FOWLER. The bill does not say that.

Mr. HAY. I think it does.

Mr. FOWLER. Indeed, it does not.

Mr. HAY. It says so, so far as the English language can make it say so.

Mr. FOWLER. Your provision for the examination of those who are now in only provides for examination for promotion.

Mr. HAY. Not at all.

Mr. FOWLER. But not for the examination of those who are in in the rank of second lieutenant.

Mr. HAY. They are not in the rank of second lieutenant.

Mr. FOWLER. Or who draw the pay of second lieutenant.

Mr. HAY. Getting the pay of a second lieutenant and getting the rank of a second lieutenant are two entirely different and distinct propositions. If the gentleman will read section 4 he will find that all the veterinarians who are now in the Army in order to stay in either as first or second lieutenants must pass this prescribed professional and physical examination, and if they do not pass it they go out of the Army. They have no sort of tenure now. They can be dropped now by order of the Secretary of War, just like any other civil employees.

Mr. FOWLER. I have read section 4 carefully, and I do not find any provision in section 4 for the retirement of any of the veterinarians who are not asking for promotion to the rank of first lieutenant.

Mr. HAY. It does not propose to retire anybody unless he has been disabled incident to his service in the Army, or unless by his service his health is such that he has become incapacitated to render any service. The men who are now veterinarians all of them occupy the same status. There is no difference between them.

Mr. FOWLER. Your bill provides for that.

Mr. HAY. It provides that it shall be so hereafter.

Mr. FOWLER. Here is what it provides. In section 4 it says:

SEC. 4. That the veterinarians of Cavalry and Field Artillery now in the Army, together with such of the veterinarians of the Quartermaster's and Subsistence Departments provided for in section 1 of this act, now employed, who at the date of the approval of this act shall have less than five years of service, be reappointed and commissioned as assistant veterinarians with the rank, pay, and allowances of second lieutenant, mounted.

Mr. HAY. Provided they stand the examination.

Mr. FOWLER. Now wait. There is no provision for the examination at all. It says:

That the veterinarians who have over five years of service be reappointed and commissioned as veterinarians with the rank, pay, and allowances of first lieutenant, mounted: Provided, That they pass a prescribed practical professional examination and a physical examination as to fitness for mounted field service.

Mr. HAY. That proviso applies both to those who are to be appointed as second lieutenants and those who are to be appointed as first lieutenants. All of them must stand this examination.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not think the bill necessarily means that.

Mr. HAY. I think it does. I do not see how it can mean anything else. The proviso applies to all of these veterinarians who are now in the service.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LINTHICUM having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 147. Joint resolution appropriating the sum of $7,245 out of money appropriated by Senate joint resolution No. 129, for the payment of transportation of American refugees from points in Mexico to the American border.

The message from the Senate also announced that, in compliance with Senate concurrent resolution No. 31, December 9, 1912, the President pro tempore of the Senate had appointed Mr. CRANE, Mr. BACON, and Mr. OVERMAN members of the joint committee on the part of the Senate to make necessary arrangements for the inauguration of the President elect of the United States on the 4th day of March next.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. WILLIAM W. WEDEMEYER, late a Representative from the State of Michigan.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of esteem and respect the Senate do now adjourn.

VETERINARY SERVICE, UNITED STATES ARMY.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman from Virginia another question or two?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say that there were now in the service three veterinarians who were over 70 years of age.

Mr. HAY. That is my information. I am not positive about that.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman also to say that veterinarians now in the service were subject to retirement. In answer to a question of my colleague [Mr. FOWLER] I understood him to say that they were retired at the age of 64.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I do not reconcile those statements.

Mr. HAY. That statement may not be altogether consistent, but my explanation of it is this: The veterinaries that are over 70 years of age are employed in the Quartermaster's or Subsistence Department, and the law which places veterinaries on the retired list will not apply to them.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Was not there an age limit of 27 fixed for admission to the Army and they were too old to get in?

Mr. HAY. I know that these three men have not now the privilege of going on the retired list, and this language in the bill was placed there for the purpose of giving them that privilege.

Mr. MANN. That is what I wanted to get at. What reason is there for covering a man into the service by this bill and immediately placing him on the retired list when it is admitted that he is not competent to perform the duties of his office? Why should not he be retired from the service entirely without pay?

Mr. HAY. The gentleman knows as well as I do that there are a great many people in the Government service——

Mr. MANN. Who want to be retired at the proper age.

Mr. HAY (continuing). Who are not able to perform the duties of their office, and they are carried on from year to year and paid the salary notwithstanding. Now, these people have served in the Army for over 40 years, as I understand it, and it is proposed by this legislation to put these three people on the retired list. That is the whole of it. I am not defending it; I do not say that it is right. If the gentleman wishes to strike it out, I am willing.

Mr. MANN. There are a great many men in the Government service who have been there for 40 years who are as much incapacitated as these gentlemen in the full performance of their duties. As for myself, I am not opposed to a civil pension list, but I am opposed to one which pays too high a rate of retired pay or a retired pension, either one. It seems to me that this is like taking any other clerks of the War Department and putting them on the retired list.

Mr. HAY. This bill provides that all the veterinarians in the Army shall stand an examination.

Mr. MANN. I hope that the gentleman from Virginia will not misunderstand me. I think this bill is a good bill. I like what the committee did in reference to the original bill, and I agree with the committee in the changes which it made from the original bill. The only thing I am calling attention to is section 4, which proposes to place on the retired list men admittedly not competent to perform their duties.

Mr. HAY. Men who would not be able to stand an examination and remain in the Army.

Mr. KAHN. Stand a physical examination.

Mr. HAY. They are now veterinarians and employed in that capacity, but if this bill becomes a law they have got to get out.

Mr. MANN. They ought to get out whether the bill becomes a law or not. If the War Department would live up to the law, probably they would get out. That is always the argument that is made whenever there is a proposition to put men on the retired list. We have certain men in the service who can not fully perform the duties of their office, and therefore it is proposed to put them on the retired list. The retired pay is three-quarters of the pay, including, I take it, longevity pay.

Mr. BUTLER. Are they able to perform the service?

Mr. KAHN. They are still performing service.

Mr. MANN. It is perfectly evident to anyone that a man over 70 years of age is not fully capable of performing the duties of a veterinary surgeon in the Army.

Mr. BUTLER. Not fully capable, but they are employed. I will agree that none of us past the age of 70 would be able to perform full duties.

Mr. MANN. Oh, a man 70 years old may have a great capacity for many things. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, if he ever gets young enough to become 70, will have the capacity to perform the work of half a dozen ordinary men.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish I could give full credit to that statement, but I know the gentleman is honest in it.

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit, the provision here does not provide that these men shall be taken care of if they can not pass the necessary professional examination. The assumption therefore must be that these men are thoroughly accomplished veterinarians. They may not be able to pass the physical examination because of their advanced age. There is nothing in this provision that I can see that would affect them so far as their ability as veterinarians is concerned.

Mr. MANN. It is admitted that these men are not fully capable of performing the functions of their office now.

Mr. KAHN. The provision in the bill reads as follows:

Provided further, That veterinarians now in the Army, and in the employ of the Quartermaster's Department and the Subsistence Department, who fail to pass the prescribed physical examination, due to disability incident to the service, and who have been incapacitated from rendering satisfactory service to the Government, shall be retired from active service with 75 per cent of the pay corresponding to length of service as prescribed herein.

That refers only to physical disability.

Mr. MANN. But a man may be capable of performing certain mental duties if he is physically incapacitated, though I have sometimes found that mental incapacity in various branches of the Government did not count for very much; but physical inability to get to a certain place is of considerable importance. There are men who come into this House who, if they were physically unable to get here, would not be able to perform any functions. Of course, nobody draws the line on mental capacity here.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois has raised a point of importance with reference to the amount of retired pay. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question about that. The amount of retired pay that these three men referred to would draw would be how much? Would their length of service prior to admission under the terms of this law be included in their pay?

Mr. HAY. I think so.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Would they be given 40 per cent fogy pay?

Mr. HAY. I think so.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am inclined to think that that ought not to be the case. I do not think they should be admitted to the Army and then be permitted to draw 40 per cent fogy pay on account of service rendered before they became officers of the Army.

Mr. KAHN. That can probably be cured by an amendment.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is a fact, is it, that they would draw 40 per cent fogy pay?

Mr. HAY. I think so.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I think that ought to be amended.

Mr. HAY. I do not see how you could discriminate between them and any other.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Because you prescribe for young men otherwise.

Mr. HAY. There is nothing said there about age except when they first come in. This provision applies to these veterinarians who are now in the Army, and not to those coming in hereafter.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Frankly I do not think they ought to be taken in when over a certain reasonable age.

Mr. HAY. It is provided that 27 shall be the age of those who shall hereafter come in.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, going back to line 8, page 6, to the language which the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has just read, we find a provision that veterinarians now in the Army and in the employ of the Quartermaster's Department and the Subsistence Department shall be exempt from physical examination under certain conditions. Why does not that provision also apply to the veterinarians in the Artillery service and in the field service?

Mr. HAY. For the reason that the veterinarians in the Cavalry service and in the Field Artillery service have now a right of retirement, and those in the Quartermaster's Department and the Subsistence Department have not.

I will state now to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that it is only those veterinarians attached to the Cavalry and Field Artillery service who are entitled to be retired under the present law, and that provision in the bill on page 6, in section 4, gives the veterinarians attached to the Quartermaster's Department and the Subsistence Department the right to retirement.

Mr. MANN. I can see no reason for extending the retired list in the Army. It is extended now beyond all reason. How much does it cost?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Two million and seven or eight hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. MANN. It costs more for the retired list in the Army and Navy now than it cost a few years ago for the entire running of the Government. Because some men are now in the Army, connected with the Army, it is now proposed to retire them. There is no reason given for it. They have nothing to do with dangerous duties, and have had nothing to do with them. While the ordinary rule is as to all these other officers that if physical disability is incurred in line of duty they may be retired, this provision is that they may be retired if the disability is incident to the service, which means if they become disabled while they are in the service. As they could not have been disabled when they went into the service, it means that all of these officers in these particular branches of the Quartermaster's Department or the reorganized Quartermaster's Department shall be subject to retirement.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, unless somebody desires further time, I will ask the Clerk to read the bill for amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HAY. Does the gentleman desire some time?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; I should like some time.

Mr. HAY. How much time?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I do not know.

Mr. HAY. Ten minutes?

Mr. MONDELL. I should like to be recognized in my own time, if I can. Does the gentleman have time that is not consumed?

Mr. HAY. I have control of an hour, and I will yield to the gentleman any time he desires.

Mr. MONDELL. I prefer to speak in my own time.

Mr. HAY. Does the gentleman propose to advocate the bill or is he opposed to the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I am opposed to some provisions in the bill, and I desire to discuss some provisions in the bill.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman that the gentleman from Illinois has had one hour on one side and I on the other——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Illinois has announced himself as being in favor of the bill.

Mr. HAY. I do not desire to cut the gentleman from Wyoming off, and I will yield any time he wants, but I do think there ought to be some end to the debate.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I think that is true.

Mr. MANN. Let us agree upon the time for closing general debate.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know that I shall want over 15 minutes.

Mr. HAY. I yield the gentleman from Wyoming 15 minutes and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] assured the chairman of the committee that he was very favorable to the provisions of the bill, and then proceeded to shoot it all full of holes and call attention to its many faults and the unfortunate character of the legislation. I doubt if it is necessary, in order to have the horses of the Army cared for in a proper way, to have the men who care for them given quasi military rank. I have a very high regard for a fighting man, for the man who volunteers to go forth in the face of danger and fight for his country and undergo hardships, toil, and privation. It is no reflection on another man who does not agree to do that that he is not put in exactly the same class; that he is not entitled to the same treatment in some respects that the other man is. We pension soldiers because they are called upon when needed to face hostile fire, to go anywhere and everywhere on the order of their superior officers without regard to the discomforts or dangers of the situation. We give them in this country considerable pay, more than they receive anywhere else, and while I think we may have overdone the matter in the matter of pay and retirement in the case of the fighting men, I think there is a very great deal of danger of overdoing the matter when we come to the civilian employees of the Army, the collateral branches of the Army. There are many civilians employed in the Army and the operation of the Army. They come and they go when they please. Their duties are not such as to compel them to face hostile fire or to undergo many of the hardships that the officer or the private soldier must at times undergo. I think there ought to be some distinction. I do not know of any reason why an employee of the Government, because he happens to draw his pay through the Secretary of War, should have all of the benefits, emoluments, rank, and pay—fogy pay and retirement—that the enlisted man or the officer of the Army has, but for the last 20 years men connected with various nonfighting branches have been insisting on being given uniforms, rank, and so forth. In other words, they have been seeking to have their status and their appearance so fixed as to rank, pay, and uniform as to make them undistinguishable to the ordinary eye from the man who is likely to be called upon at any time to perform the most dangerous and arduous service of a soldier.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman from Wyoming yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. KAHN. Is the gentleman from Wyoming aware of the fact that Germany, Austria, France, England, and even Canada have veterinarian corps practically on all fours with the corps that is proposed to be created by this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the gentleman is well informed and usually accurate and what he says is partly true, and the fact that it is partly true only is one of the reasons why I am opposed to it. If there is anything I do not take to kindly, without being sure that it is correct and proper under our conditions, it is the patterning after the services of monarchal Europe.

Mr. KAHN. Does not the gentleman concede——

Mr. MONDELL. The fact is, however, that so far as Germany is concerned, no man is an officer unless he is a fighting man. And I admire the German idea. It is not because we do not have a high regard for these other men and believe their services are honorable, and that their profession is honorable, but they are not soldiers——

Mr. KAHN. They are called military officials.

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). They may have pay based on rank, and I suppose they try to be recognized, but they are not recognized, as officers. In England, and to a certain extent in bureaucratic France, I think, they have the system which it is proposed to inaugurate here.

Mr. KAHN. And in Austria also.

Mr. MONDELL. And they go further than this bill does. This bill is, as I suggested, the first step in that direction.

Mr. KAHN. In Germany they pass as military officers.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. We have recently had a great deal of talk of concentration, based, of course, on the monarchical idea that you must have your troops in large cities, where grape and canister can be poured down the main streets and overawe the people and sweep them from the face of the earth if they defy the monarchical power, and as they do that in Europe there are certain gentlemen who think we ought to do it in the United States. There is no argument for it at all.

It was argued on behalf of the doctors that on certain occasions they were exposed to fire, which is very true, and no greater acts of heroism have ever been performed on the field of carnage than have been performed by surgeons in rescuing men, caring for them, dressing their wounds, and attending to them under fire. But pray tell me can you conjure up a situation in which it will be necessary for a veterinary surgeon to place himself on the firing line? It was argued in behalf of the doctors that there were times when they ought to be in position of authority, and that is true. But can the gentleman imagine a situation where a veterinary surgeon should have precedence over a line officer? I assume that it is not the gentleman's notion that the veterinary surgeons of the first-lieutenant class ought to be in a position to countermand an order to charge given by a second lieutenant on the theory that the horses have corns, ringbone, or spavin, and are not in fit condition to charge. If that is the gentleman's idea, why, of course, he can carry it out and work it out through this legislation.

Now, the veterinary surgeon is as good a citizen as anybody. But he is not a fighting man, and, therefore, I am not now and never shall be in favor of any legislation the object of which or the tendency of which is to wipe out the line between the fighting men of the Military Establishment and the civil forces connected with it.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is favorable to a civil pension. My sympathies all incline me that way. My judgment so far has been rather against it, but if a veterinary surgeon in the Army should be retired with two-thirds pay, why should not a veterinary surgeon in connection with the Reclamation Service, or other Government works here, there, and elsewhere, be retired on such pay? Why should not other employees doing equally meritorious service be retired in the same way? If we are to retire these men, we ought not to retire them in the way provided in this bill and give some of them the benefit of years of service that they never had. While I would like very much to follow the Military Committee, and generally have great confidence in its judgment, I do not believe veterinary service connected with the United States Army requires such legislation as this.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the President is hereby authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint veterinarians and assistant veterinarians in the Army, not to exceed 2 such officers for each regiment of Cavalry and Field Artillery, 15 as inspectors of horses and mules and as veterinarians in the Quartermaster's Department, and 5 as inspectors of meats for the Subsistence Department, not to exceed 62 in all.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, on line 25, page 4, I move to strike out the word "fifteen" and insert the word "twenty."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 4, line 25, by striking out the word "fifteen" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twenty."

Mr. HAY. I am going to follow that by offering an amendment also to strike out, in lines 1 and 2, page 5, the words "and five as inspectors of meats for the Subsistence Department." The reason I do that is because the two departments have been consolidated, and under the consolidation the two departments now form the Quartermaster Corps. I will follow that up and move to strike out, in line 1, page 5, the words "Quartermaster's Department" and insert "Quartermaster Corps."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment just offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 5, line 1, by striking out the word "five" and inserting the word "six."

Mr. HAY. No. Strike out, in line 1, page 5, first the words "Quartermaster's Department" and insert the words "Quartermaster Corps."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 5, line 1, by striking out the words "Quartermaster's Department."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. And also on page 5, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "and five as inspectors of meats for the Subsistence Department."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 5, lines 1 and 2, by striking out the words "and five as inspectors of meats for the Subsistence Department."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, let the Clerk read the section as it will read when amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the President is hereby authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint veterinarians and assistant veterinarians in the Army, not to exceed two such officers for each regiment of Cavalry and Field Artillery, 20 as inspectors of horses and mules and as veterinarians in the Quartermaster Corps Department, and 5 as inspectors of meats for the Subsistence Department, not to exceed 62 in all.

Mr. HAY. "Five inspectors of meats for the Subsistence Department" should be stricken out.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs the propriety of striking out also the words "as inspectors of horses and mules," so that it will read, "20 as veterinarians in the Quartermaster Corps," so that the chief of the Quartermaster Corps may use those veterinarians either as inspectors of horses and mules or as inspectors of meats, as he may choose. As the chairman has left the provision, they would all be inspectors of meats.

Mr. HAY. I accept that amendment. Strike out "inspectors of horses and mules and as."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 4, line 25, by striking out the words "as inspectors of horses and mules and as."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does not want to strike out the word "as."

Mr. HAY. So that it will read, "Twenty veterinarians in the Quartermaster Corps."

Mr. MANN. "Twenty as veterinarians in the Quartermaster Corps."

Mr. TILSON. Should not the word "as" be kept in?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The President is authorized to appoint them as veterinarians in the Quartermaster Corps.

Mr. TILSON. Under the amended language there is just as much reason to keep in the word "as" as before.

Mr. HAY. No. We are now fixing the number of veterinarians in the Quartermaster Corps, and we say "20 veterinarians in the Quartermaster Corps."

Mr. MANN. How many will be appointed under the provision "not to exceed two for each regiment of Cavalry and Field Artillery"?

Mr. HAY. Well, there are 15 regiments of Cavalry and 6 regiments of Field Artillery. That would be 40.

Mr. MANN. There ought to be some word in there to make good sense. It ought to read:

And 20 veterinarians in the Quartermaster Corps—

If those are different from the others.

Mr. HAY. Put in the word "and" before the word "twenty," so that it will read:

And 20 veterinarians in the Quartermaster Corps, not to exceed 62 in all.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HAY. I move to amend, in line 25, by inserting the word "and" before the word "twenty."

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 25, before the word "twenty" and after the word "Artillery," insert the word "and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Now, if the Clerk will read the section as amended, I will be much obliged to him.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the President is hereby authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint veterinarians and assistant veterinarians in the Army, not to exceed 2 such officers for each regiment of Cavalry and Field Artillery, and 20 veterinarians in the Quartermaster Corps, not to exceed 62 in all.

Mr. HAY. That is all right.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That an assistant veterinarian appointed under section 2 of this act shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of second lieutenant, mounted; that after five years of service an assistant veterinarian shall be promoted to the rank, pay, and allowances of first lieutenant, mounted: Provided, That he passes a satisfactory examination under such rules as the President may prescribe as to professional qualifications and adaptability for the mounted service; or, if found deficient, he shall be discharged from the Army with one year's pay and have no further claim on the Government.

Mr. TILSON. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee if it would not be better to strike out the word "mounted" where it appears, as the distinction in pay between mounted and dismounted service has been done away with.

Mr. HAY. I have no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that in line 13, page 5, after the word "lieutenant," the word "mounted" be stricken out, and in line 15, after the word "lieutenant," the word "mounted" be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, in line 13, strike out the word "mounted" after the word "lieutenant," and on page 5, in line 15, strike out the word "mounted" after the word "lieutenant."

Mr. TILSON. That includes the comma and the word "mounted" in both cases.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 16, page 5, after the word "satisfactory," by inserting the words "mental and physical."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 5, line 16, by adding after the word "satisfactory" the words "mental and physical."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the veterinarians of Cavalry and Field Artillery now in the Army, together with such of the veterinarians of the Quartermaster's and Subsistence Departments provided for in section 1 of this act, now employed, who at the date of the approval of this act shall have less than five years of service, be reappointed and commissioned as assistant veterinarians with the rank, pay, and allowances of second lieutenant, mounted; that the veterinarians who have over five years of service be reappointed and commissioned as veterinarians with the rank, pay, and allowances of first lieutenant, mounted: Provided, That they pass a prescribed practical professional examination and a physical examination as to fitness for mounted field service: Provided further, That veterinarians now in the Army, and in the employ of the Quartermaster's Department and the Subsistence Department, who fail to pass the prescribed physical examination, due to disability incident to the service, and who have been incapacitated from rendering satisfactory service to the Government, shall be retired from active service with 75 per cent of the pay corresponding to length of service as prescribed herein.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend in line 23, page 5, by striking out the words "Quartermaster's and Subsistence Departments" and in inserting in lieu thereof the words "Quartermaster Corps."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 5, line 23, by striking out the words "Quartermaster's and Subsistence Departments" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "Quartermaster Corps."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. In line 3, on page 6, I move to strike out the comma after the word "lieutenant," and the word "mounted."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 3, after the word "lieutenant" strike out the comma and the word "mounted."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. I move the same amendment in line 6, page 6.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 6, strike out the comma after the word "lieutenant" and strike out the word "mounted."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 10 and 11, page 6, strike out the words "Quartermaster's Department and the Subsistence Department" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Quartermaster Corps.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. I move to strike out the proviso beginning in line 8.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all of section 4 after the word "service" in line 8, page 6.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of War, upon recommendation of the Quartermaster General, may appoint, for such time as their services may be required, such number of reserve veterinarians as may be necessary to attend public animals pertaining to the Quartermaster's or other departments or corps, who shall have the pay and allowances of second lieutenant, mounted, during such period of service and no longer: Provided, That such reserve veterinarians be graduates of a recognized veterinary college or university and have previously passed such moral, professional, and physical examination as may be deemed necessary by the Secretary of War for the proper performance of their duties in mounted field service.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend line 18, on page 6, by inserting the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 18, page 6, strike out the words "Quartermaster General" and insert in lieu thereof the words "chief of the Quartermaster Corps."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, in line 23, page 6, I move to amend by striking out the word "mounted" and the comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, in line 21, page 6, after the word "Quartermaster," I move to strike out the "s" and apostrophe.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. I move to insert the word "Corps" after the word "Quartermaster."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, continuing the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of War is authorized to appoint a board of examiners to conduct the examinations prescribed herein, one member of which shall be a field officer, one a surgeon, and two veterinarians.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 19, page 7, after the word "officer," insert the words "of the line."

Mr. TILSON. It seems to me this amendment ought to be adopted. I believe it was the intention that he should be an officer of the line.

Mr. HAY. A field officer could not be anything else than an officer of the line.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, yes; he might be a medical officer, for instance.

Mr. HAY. A medical officer is not an officer in the sense of an officer of the line.

Mr. TILSON. He may have field rank.

Mr. HAY. So has the quartermaster in the Quartermaster Corps or in the Ordnance Corps, but he is not a field officer.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Connecticut does not want to use the language "field officer of the line."

Mr. HAY. That is what he wants to say.

Mr. MANN. I never heard the expression.

Mr. TILSON. It is correct and proper.

Mr. SLAYDEN. You might say "a line officer not below the rank of major."

Mr. HAY. A field officer is above the rank of captain.

Mr. TILSON. I ask that my amendment be considered, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment and do not think it ought to be agreed to. I am willing to agree to language that will embrace what the gentleman is after. I will agree that it shall be "a line officer not below the rank of major."

Mr. TILSON. That will answer my purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 7, lines 18 and 19, by striking out the words "field officer" and insert in lieu thereof "officer of the line not below the rank of major."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the adoption of the substitute as amended.

The question was considered, and the substitute as amended was adopted.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendment to the House, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended passed.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CLARK of Florida, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16843) to consolidate the veterinary service, United States Army, and to increase its efficiency, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be adopted and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to its final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. MCMORRAN, for 10 days, on account of important business.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

Mr. DICKINSON, for 10 days, on account of sickness in family.

STATE SELECTION OF PHOSPHATE AND OIL LANDS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 26812) to provide for State selection of phosphate and oil lands.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act unreserved public lands of the United States in the State of Idaho which have been withdrawn or classified as phosphate or oil lands, or are valuable for phosphates or oil, shall be subject to selection by the State of Idaho under indemnity and other land grants made to it by Congress whenever such selections shall be made with a view of obtaining or passing title, with a reservation to the United States of the phosphates and oil in such lands, and of the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same.

SEC. 2. That the State of Idaho, when applying to select lands classified as phosphate or oil lands, or valuable for phosphates or oil, with a view to securing or passing title to the same in accordance with the provisions of the indemnity and other granting acts, shall state in the application for selection that same is made in accordance with and subject to the provisions and reservations of this act.

SEC. 3. That upon satisfactory proof of full compliance with the provisions of the laws under which selection is made and this act, the State shall be entitled to a patent to the lands selected by it, which patent shall contain a reservation to the United States of all the phosphates and oil in the land so patented, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same upon rendering compensation to the patentee for all damages that may be caused by prospecting for and removing such phosphates or oil. The reserved phosphate and oil deposits in such lands shall be disposed of only as shall be hereafter expressly directed by law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I am in sympathy with the objects and purposes of this legislation, but the bill ought not to pass in its present form. We have heretofore legislated upon this subject—that is, we have legislated on the subject of selections and entries of coal lands. It is now proposed to legislate upon the subject of selections by the State of Idaho of oil and phosphate lands. Our legislation upon this subject ought to be uniform. Great confusion will occur if it is not uniform, and while this applies only to the State of Idaho, and therefore it might be said that perhaps our interest is a little remote, and that the legislation is satisfactory to the gentleman who is responsible directly to the people of Idaho, yet legislation of the character of this before us, following the legislation we have already had, becomes a precedent for other legislation.

The Secretary of the Interior has recommended an amendment. In lieu of section 3 of the bill he proposes that we place in the bill the provision of section 3 of the act of June 27, 1910, and he proceeds to set forth a part of the provisions of that section. The part of the provisions of that section which the Secretary quotes are incorporated in the bill, but exceedingly important provisions of that section are not incorporated in the bill. That section provides for two things—first, for a prospecting bond; and, second, for obtaining the right to enter and mine and remove from the United States, with a reserved right of reentry to retake the surface of the land or so much of it as may be necessary for actual operations. And it provides for procedures before the local courts in connection with those operations. All of those important provisions are omitted, I think unintentionally, from the Secretary's recommendation. They were not incorporated by the committee, I presume, because the committee assumed that the Secretary quoted all of the provisions, when, as a matter of fact, he quoted nothing but the prospecting provisions. This matter was very carefully worked out and very thoroughly discussed in committee at the time the act referred to was under consideration.

The committee discussed the provisions of that section, and it represents the view of the lawyers on the committee, of whom I was not one, as to what is necessary in order to fix and secure the right to go upon these lands to mine. The right of reentry is reserved, the right to take so much of the surface as is necessary, to occupy and use and pay for it, and settle damages in the local courts. None of that is contained in these provisions.

Mr. FERRIS. Is it the judgment of the gentleman that section 3, which is printed in italics in the bill, should be stricken out and that there should be substituted therefor the language of the bill that was more thoroughly worked out heretofore?

Mr. MONDELL. Modifying it by striking out the word "coal" and inserting "oil and phosphate," and striking out other language so that you would preserve identical legislation upon this general subject.

Mr. FRENCH. As the author of the bill, I will be very glad to entertain and support the proposition of the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the gentleman from Wyoming could offer amendments that would be entirely satisfactory to him, and that would harmonize the bill with the legislation that the Secretary says it ought to correspond with, but whether, without further consideration than we could have here at this time, the House would be willing to accept that as being exactly what we should do, of course I do not know. I could easily offer amendments that would accomplish what I have in mind, which would be what the Secretary suggested should be done.

Mr. FRENCH. And the committee accepted the words of the proposed section 3 prepared by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MONDELL. Then, through inadvertance no doubt, the Secretary of the Interior or some clerk in his department left out the more important part of the provisions of section 3.

Mr. FRENCH. Then why not let the matter go before the House for consideration, and I think that the section that the gentleman proposes is so thoroughly understood by the Members that it will be agreeable, and I will be glad to support it in lieu of section 3 as proposed.

Mr. MONDELL. It will require considerable modification, I will say to the gentleman, and I think this so highly important there should be no question but that when we adopt this legislation it shall be identical in procedure with the legislation that we adopted on the same subject. In other words, we will be working in one State under one piece of legislation and in another State under another.

Mr. FRENCH. I am in perfect harmony with that idea, but I think that the matter is one that we can very readily agree to without having the matter go over to another day.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee in charge of the bill, I may say I am in perfect sympathy with the position of the gentleman from Wyoming and will accept the amendment, if he cares to offer it, and I hope he will offer it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not understand the gentleman.

Mr. MURRAY. I was trying to make the matter more clear to the gentleman from Wyoming than to the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was addressing the gentleman from Wyoming more than the Chair?

Mr. MURRAY. Yes; and I shall be very glad, Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Wyoming has suggested an amendment, as the Member in charge of the bill for the committee, to say that the committee will be happy to accept it if he cares to offer his amendment. If his purpose is to retard the progress of the bill we shall not waste any time about it, but if his purpose is to correct what may or may not be a mistake on the part of somebody we will be happy to accept his amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, my only purpose is to perfect the legislation and aid in its enactment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. In view of what has just transpired and the very great importance of this subject, I do not think that an amendment should be made contrary to the report of the Secretary of the Interior or contrary to the recommendation of the committee itself, and I suggest the gentleman pass this over without prejudice.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Wisconsin have in mind that the proposed modification is entirely similar to that in a bill which has already passed the House with regard to coal lands?

Mr. LENROOT. I appreciate that, but in the hurry of the moment here I question very seriously whether that should be undertaken now, it having been raised by the gentleman from Wyoming that a matter of such importance should be more carefully considered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withhold his objection for a few moments. The matter of handling these lands is now under consideration by the present officers of the department and the officers of the State of Idaho, and it would certainly save a great deal of work if the matter could be expedited so that the whole question would not need to be thrashed over again. I think the gentleman knows that not an acre of land is granted to the State, but it simply provides for the selection of certain lands which were available for selection at the time the grants were made to the State and which have since that time been included within the reserve of the character indicated in the bill. I think that the reservations that have been made to the Government are ample, but I am very willing to accept the language of the bill which we passed a little over a year ago, nearly two years ago, on this same subject, in which a certain section is probably worked out with more care than this particular section is, and I believe it will be very satisfactory to have a consideration of this bill at this time, and I would like very much to have that done.

Mr. LENROOT. I will say to the gentleman, I say what I have said, because the gentleman from Wyoming has stated that it will require considerable work to fit the proposed section into this bill and it will require considerable thought as to the modification that may be necessary.

And even upon so important legislation of that kind the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] himself, I understand, is not prepared to offer the amendment now, and I suggest that the matter go over without prejudice. Otherwise, I shall feel compelled to object.

Mr. MONDELL. I am in position to offer the amendment, but I agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] that I can scarcely expect the House, without full consideration, to assume that all of this very considerable amendment which I am to offer is just what should be adopted. I have not any question but that the House would agree if we had time for discussion. I am simply proposing to make this section agree in general terms with the section that the Secretary suggests it should follow, but which the Secretary in his letter did not set forth in full.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I feel compelled to object. It can be taken up two weeks from now, and then we shall have an opportunity to examine this matter. I object to the consideration of the matter in this way.

NATIONAL CONSERVATION EXPOSITION, KNOXVILLE, TENN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 26190) to provide for participation by the Government of the United States in the National Conservation Exposition, to be held at Knoxville, Tenn., in the fall of 1913.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Government of the United States participate in the National Conservation Exposition, to be held at Knoxville, Tenn., during the fall of 1913. That there shall be exhibited at said exposition from the executive departments of the United States such articles and materials as will illustrate the administrative functions of the Government and their educational value in connection with the development and wise use of the natural resources of the United States, especially the advancement of scientific agriculture and the increase of productivity of the soil through improved cultivation and crop selection and the prevention of avoidable wastes; the reclamation of wet and dry lands by drainage and irrigation, respectively; the more economical development and utilization of mineral wealth; the judicious use of and prevention of needless destruction in woodlands for maintaining timber supply and protecting headwaters of streams; the use and improvement of inland waterways; the preservation of fish and game; the preservation and protection of life in connection with industrial operations; and the economic investigations and operations of the Government with reference to mines and mining, geology, topographic and other surveys, public roads, experiment stations, rural life improvement, education, child welfare, and public health and sanitation. That these subjects shall be presented in exhibits and in illustrated lectures by representatives of the Government. That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to invite the nations of the world to send delegates to an international convention at said exposition, to discuss the natural resources of the world and their distribution through commerce. To secure a complete and harmonious arrangement of such Government exhibit a United States Government board of managers is hereby authorized to be appointed to be charged with the selection, purchase, preparation, transportation, arrangement, safe-keeping, exhibition, and return of such articles and materials as the heads of the several departments, respectively, decide shall be embraced in the Government exhibit herein authorized. The President of the United States may also designate additional articles of peculiar interest for exhibition in connection with the said Government exhibit. Said Government board of managers shall be composed of three persons now in the employ of the Government and shall be appointed by the President, one of whom shall be designated by the President as chairman of the said board and one as secretary and disbursing officer. The members of said Government board, with other officers and employees of the Government who may be detailed to assist them, including officers of the Army and Navy, shall receive no compensation in addition to their regular salaries, but they shall be allowed their actual and necessary traveling expenses, together with a per diem in lieu of subsistence, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, while necessarily absent from their homes engaged upon the business of the board. Officers of the Army and Navy shall receive said allowance in lieu of the subsistence and mileage now allowed by law; and the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy may, in their discretion, detail retired Army or Navy officers for such duty. Any provision of law which may prohibit the detail of persons in the employ of the United States to other service than that which they customarily perform shall not apply to persons detailed for duty in connection with said National Conservation Exposition. Employees of the board not otherwise employed by the Government shall be entitled to such compensation as the board may determine, and such employees may be selected and appointed by said board. The disbursing officer shall give bond in such sum as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine for the faithful performance of his duties, said bond to be approved by said Secretary. The Secretary of the Treasury shall advance to said officer from time to time, under such regulations as he may prescribe, a sum of money from the appropriation for the Government exhibit herein authorized, not exceeding at any one time three-fourths of the penalty of his bond, to enable him to pay the expenses of said exhibit as authorized by the United States Government board herein created. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to place on exhibition, in connection with the exhibit of his department, upon such grounds as shall be allotted for this purpose, one of the life-saving stations authorized to be constructed on the Atlantic coast of the United States by existing law, and to cause the same to be fully equipped with all apparatus, furniture, and appliances now in use in life-saving stations in the United States: Provided, That the cost of said exhibit herein authorized, including the selection, purchase, preparation, transportation, arrangement, safe-keeping, exhibition, and return of the articles and materials so exhibited, and the expenses and per diems of the officials and employees of the Government connected with the exhibit or assigned to deliver lectures, shall not exceed the sum of $100,000, which sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause a suitable, permanent building to be erected on the site of said National Conservation Exposition for said Government exhibit. Said building shall be erected from plans prepared by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to contract for said building in the same manner and under the same regulations as for other buildings of the United States, but the contract for said building, including the preparation of ground therefor and the approaches thereto, and the interior and exterior decorative wiring and lighting, etc., therefor, shall not exceed the sum of $150,000, which sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That a suitable building site and grounds satisfactory to the Government board of managers herein established shall be deeded to the Government of the United States in fee simple for the purpose.

SEC. 3. That all articles that shall be imported from foreign countries for the sole purpose of exhibition at the National Conservation Exposition, to be held at Knoxville, Tenn., in the year 1913, upon which there shall be a tariff or customs duty shall be admitted free of the payment of duty, customs fees, or charges, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; but it shall be lawful at any time during the exposition to sell for delivery at the close thereof any goods or property imported for and actually on exhibition in the exposition buildings or on the grounds, subject to such regulations for the security of the revenue and for the collection of import duties as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That all such articles when sold or withdrawn for consumption or use in the United States shall be subject to the duty, if any, imposed upon such articles by the revenue laws in force at the date of withdrawal; and on such articles which shall have suffered diminution or deterioration from incidental handling and necessary exposure the duty, if paid, shall be assessed according to the appraised value at the time of withdrawal for consumption or use, and the penalties prescribed by law shall be enforced against any person guilty of any illegal sale, use, or withdrawal.

SEC. 4. That medals with appropriate devices, emblems, and inscriptions commemorative of said National Conservation Exposition and of the awards to be made to the exhibitors thereat shall be prepared for the National Conservation Exposition Co. by the Secretary of the Treasury at some mint of the United States, subject to the provisions of the fifty-second section of the coinage act of 1893, upon the payment by the National Conservation Exposition of a sum equal to the cost thereof; and authority may be given by the Secretary of the Treasury to the holder of a medal properly awarded to him to have duplicates thereof made at any of the mints of the United States from gold, silver, or bronze, upon the payment by him for the same of a sum equal to the cost thereof.

SEC. 5. That the United States shall not be liable on account of said exposition for any expenses incident to or growing out of the same, except for the purpose of paying the expense incident to the selection, preparation, purchase, installation, transportation, care, custody, and safe return of the exhibits made by the Government, and for the employment of proper persons as officers and assistants by the Government board created by this act, and for other expenses to be approved by the chairman of the Government board, or, in the event of his absence or disability, by such officer as the board may designate, and the Secretary of the Treasury, upon itemized accounts and vouchers.

SEC. 6. That the United States shall not in any manner or under any circumstances be liable for any of the acts, doings, or representations of said National Conservation Exposition Co. (a corporation), its officers, agents, servants, or employees, or any of them, or for service, salaries, labor, or wages of said officers, agents, servants, or employees, or any of them, or for any subscriptions to the capital stock, or for any stock certificates, bonds, mortgages, or obligations of any kind issued by said corporation, or for any debts, liabilities, or expenses of any kind or nature whatever attending such exposition corporation or accruing by reason of the same.

SEC. 7. That nothing in this act shall be construed so as to create any liability upon the part of the United States, directly or indirectly, for any debt or obligation incurred or for any claim for aid or pecuniary assistance from Congress or the Treasury of the United States in support or liquidation of any debts or obligations created by said United States Government board in excess of appropriations herein made.

SEC. 8. That the United States shall not in any manner or under any circumstances make any loan, directly or indirectly, to the National Conservation Exposition Co., or for the benefit of said exposition, or for any of the purposes thereof, and shall not appropriate for any purpose whatsoever in connection with said exposition any sum of money other than that provided in this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, if there is anybody who has anything to say in defense of this bill I would like to hear it, otherwise I shall object.

Mr. AUSTIN. This bill needs no defense. I will be very glad to answer any questions the gentleman may ask.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course, if that is the way the gentleman feels about it, I shall feel compelled to object to it.

Mr. AUSTIN. What is the inquiry of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have read the bill and have examined the report, and from the information I have I think I am prepared to object.

Mr. AUSTIN. What is the information the gentleman seeks which is not embraced in the bill or in the report accompanying the bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I thought perhaps the gentleman might desire to make a brief statement in reference to the bill. May I ask the gentleman if he is a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. AUSTIN. I am.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why is it necessary to provide for a public building in a bill of this character for his district? Is he unable to satisfy the demands made upon him in the omnibus bill that is expected? Provision is made in this bill for a permanent building at Knoxville, Tenn.

Mr. MANN. What makes the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] think that there will be an omnibus building bill? Is he advocating one?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not expressed the belief that there will be one.

Mr. AUSTIN. This bill is the usual bill passed by Congress for the aid of national expositions and carries a sufficient amount of money not only for an exhibit, but also for a building. This is to be a permanent exposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the gentleman intends to locate a permanent conservation exposition at Knoxville, Tenn., regardless of the other cities of the United States?

Mr. AUSTIN. We think it is of sufficient importance to make it a permanent exposition so far as that section is concerned and so far as the people of the whole South are concerned, and our enterprising and progressive people are willing to finance and maintain it as a permanent exposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The report setting forth the purpose of making this a permanent building is not to permit the exposition association or company to maintain it, but to provide accommodations for such departments of the Federal Government as may be active in that particular part of the country. That is why I thought perhaps it would be desirable to have some information in addition to that contained in the report, some information as to the character of the exhibits to be made, the amount of money to be expended in preparing and setting them up, the amount to be expended for the salaries of employees, and the amount to be expended in other ways.

Mr. AUSTIN. In answer to that I will state to the gentleman that this report states when this building is no longer needed for exhibition purposes it can be used profitably by the Government on account of the crowded condition of the Knoxville post-office building.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No building that was ever erected for exposition purposes would be satisfactory as a post-office building, even in Knoxville, Tenn.

Mr. AUSTIN. But there are Government officials that could utilize this building just as well as they could a post-office building or a customhouse building.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think that is a minor objection, if I may be permitted to say so. I am more interested in knowing in more detail the character of the exhibits to be made by the Government departments and the manner in which it was estimated that the $100,000 required in addition to the $150,000 for the building is to be expended.

Mr. AUSTIN. This bill has been submitted to the various officers of the Government that would be affected by the exhibits we propose to make at Knoxville by the Federal Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have read the list, and every one of them can safely be set down as anything but economical in the expenditure of public funds.

Mr. AUSTIN. Not only is it the purpose of the Government officials to use these exhibits at Knoxville, but also to use them at other expositions in other places where the dates do not conflict.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to inquire who has authorized these Government officials to determine in advance that they shall be permitted to make exhibits, not only at this exposition, but to various other expositions that they desire to participate in? I notice that the advisory board of this exposition consists of nine officers of the Federal Government and three others, two of whom were formerly associated with the Government. This exposition is to consist not only of Government exhibits, but a part of the Government exhibits is to consist of illustrated lectures to be given by officials of the various departments of the Government.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What is it? Is it a kind of Chautauqua?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Provision is also made for the detail of retired Army and Navy officers in connection with it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. For lectures?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am unable to determine the purpose.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I thought the gentleman said there were to be entertainments or lectures or something of that sort.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The bill provides that these subjects shall be presented in exhibits and illustrated by lectures on the part of representatives of the Government.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I thought that was what the gentleman said. It seems to be a sort of Chautauqua, carried on at Government expense.

Mr. AUSTIN. I may say that work of this kind has been carried on by the Government not only in New York State, but also in the State of Texas, where the representatives of the departments have been called upon to deliver lectures; as, for example, at expositions at Cincinnati and at Pittsburgh and at other places. It was carried on also at Knoxville three years ago, when an exposition was held in that city. It is not a new departure. It is a very valuable and instructive method of imparting valuable information to the people of this country.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That may be. I do not challenge the accuracy of the gentleman's statement in the regard. But with the meager information that is given in this report, and in view of the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury estimates that regardless of any appropriations to supply deficiencies at this session of Congress, eliminating all provision for the Panama Canal, appropriations for which are to be reimbursed out of an issue of bonds, and eliminating about $60,000,000 required for sinking-fund purposes, there will still be a deficit of $25,000,000 in the coming fiscal year, it seems to me there should be some satisfactory reason assigned for an appropriation of $250,000 for a local exposition.

Mr. AUSTIN. It is not a local exposition. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is trying to convert it into something else; but it is a local exposition and has been conducted as a local exposition for two years, and now it is desired to utilize the Federal Treasury to the extent of a quarter of a million dollars to assist it and make it permanent at Knoxville, Tenn.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. I will state that the representatives of this country who have directed public sentiment in the direction of conservation legislation have proposed to establish an exposition of this kind in some part of the United States, and invited proposals. It was open to every city of the United States, but the city of Knoxville, Tenn., was the only city that submitted a proposition that was satisfactory.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the population of Knoxville?

Mr. AUSTIN. Eighty-five thousand, and that city has more enterprise in connection with movements of this kind than has the city—New York—which the gentleman represents.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman from Tennessee is mistaken about that.

Mr. AUSTIN. I know of no city in the United States more capable of establishing and successfully conducting such an exposition than Knoxville.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the city of New York entered upon such an undertaking the people of that city would do it themselves.

Mr. AUSTIN. This exposition was indorsed by the National Conservation Congress, held at Indianapolis, Ind., where 35 States were represented. It was unanimously indorsed by the Southern Commercial Congress, represented by 2,000 delegates from every Southern State. It was also indorsed by the Southern Press Association.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was also indorsed by the Woman's National River and Harbor Congress?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes. And is not that a very proper and a very weighty indorsement, that should commend itself to the American Congress?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am surprised that the gentleman limited the number of indorsements.

Mr. AUSTIN. I assert it cheerfully, because that organization is largely made up of the wives of Members of this Congress.

This proposition was considered so important by the members of the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions that they named a subcommittee to go to Knoxville, Tenn., and officially investigate the situation there. That subcommittee came back, and the committee had two meetings and reported out this bill by unanimous vote.

Of course, there may be a deficit in the Treasury, but here is a proposition which involves the expenditure of $250,000, affecting legislation which is far-reaching and to which all three political parties in this country were committed in their national platforms.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They were not committed to this exposition.

Mr. AUSTIN. No; but committed to the legislation that this exposition indorses, encourages, and advocates, not in theory, but in practice and by practical demonstration.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then I think we might better occupy the time of the House in considering the legislation.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then let the gentleman "fish or cut bait."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects. The bill will be stricken from the calendar, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

SENATE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 5068. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange lands for school sections within an Indian, military, national forest, or other reservation, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. J. Res. 147. Joint resolution appropriating the sum of $7,245 out of money appropriated by Senate joint resolution 129 for the payment of transportation of American refuges from points in Mexico to the American border; to the Committee on Appropriations.

INDIANS OCCUPYING RAILROAD LANDS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 5674) for the relief of Indians occupying railroad lands.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to request of the present claimant under any railroad land grant a relinquishment or reconveyance of any lands passing under the grant which are shown to have been occupied for five years or more by an Indian entitled to receive the tract in allotment under existing law but for the grant to the railroad company, and upon the execution and filing of such relinquishment or reconveyance the lands shall thereupon become available for allotment, and the company relinquishing or reconveying shall be entitled to select and have patented to it other vacant public lands of equal value in the same State, as may be agreed upon with the Secretary of the Interior.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, my recollection is that this bill was on the Unanimous Consent Calendar once before, and I objected to it at that time because there was no limitation upon the amount of public lands which might be taken up under the term "equal value." I understand the gentleman from Arizona is preparing an amendment to obviate that.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have an amendment that I will offer which will obviate that.

Mr. MANN. Very well, then; I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask unanimous consent to consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYDEN. I offer the following amendment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. There are some committee amendments which should be agreed to first.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill by sections.

The Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, in line 4, after the word "authorize," insert the words "in his discretion."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "lands," insert the words "situated within the States of Arizona or New Mexico."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 1, after the word "select," insert the words "within a period of two years after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by striking out all after the word "act," in line 2, page 2, and insert the following:

"And have patented to it other vacant, nonmineral, nontimbered, surveyed public lands of equal area and value, situated in the same State, as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That the total area of land that may be exchanged under provisions of this act shall not exceed 4,000 acres."

[Mr. HAYDEN addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

By unanimous consent the title was amended so as to read: "An act for the relief of Indians occupying railroad lands in Arizona or New Mexico."

On motion of Mr. HAYDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed was laid on the table.

STANDING ROCK INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 109) to authorize the sale and disposition of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Standing Rock Indian Reservation, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect, as amended, and pending that I ask unanimous consent that the substitute be read in lieu of the bill, as the substitute is the amendment.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can include that in his motion.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota moves to suspend the rules and pass, as amended, the bill which the Clerk will report in its amended form.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, as hereinafter provided, to sell and dispose of all that portion of the Standing Rock Indian Reservation, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, lying and being within the following-described boundaries, to wit: Commencing at a point in the center of the main channel of the Missouri River where the township line between townships 18 and 19 north intersects the same; thence west on said township line to a point where the range line between ranges 22 and 23 east intersects the same; thence north along the said range line to the northwest corner of section 19, in township 21 north, of range 23 east; thence east on the section line north of sections 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24 to a point where the same intersects the range line between ranges 23 and 24 east; thence north along said range line to a point where the same intersects the State line between the States of South Dakota and North Dakota; thence west on said State line to a point where the range line between ranges 84 and 85 west in North Dakota intersects the same; thence north on said range line between ranges 84 and 85 west to a point where it intersects the center of the main channel of the Cannon Ball River; thence in a northeasterly direction down and along the center of the main channel of said Cannon Ball River to a point where it intersects the center of the main channel of the Missouri River; thence in a southerly direction along the center of the main channel of the said Missouri River to the place of beginning, and including also entirely all islands, if any, in said river, except such portions thereof as have been allotted to Indians: Provided, That sections 16 and 36 of the lands in each township therein shall not be disposed of, but shall be reserved for the use of the common schools of the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, respectively: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may reserve such lands as he may deem necessary for agency, school, and religious purposes, to remain reserved as long as needed and as long as agency, school, or religious institutions are maintained thereon for the benefit of said Indians: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to issue a patent in fee simple to the duly authorized missionary board, or other proper authority of any religious organization, heretofore engaged in mission or school work on said reservation, for such lands thereon (not included in any town site herein provided for) as have been heretofore set apart to such organization for mission or school purposes.

SEC. 2. That the lands shall be disposed of by proclamation under the general provisions of the homestead and town-site laws of the United States, and shall be opened to settlement and entry by proclamation of the President, which proclamation shall prescribe the manner in which the lands may be settled upon, occupied, and entered by persons entitled to make entry thereof; and no person shall be permitted to settle upon, occupy, or enter any of said lands except as prescribed in said proclamation: Provided, That prior to said proclamation the Secretary of the Interior shall cause allotments to be made to every man, woman, and child belonging to or holding tribal relations in said reservations who have not heretofore received the allotments to which they are entitled under provisions of existing laws: Provided, however, That the said Secretary is hereby authorized to designate the superintendent of the Standing Rock Indian School to allot each child born subsequent to the completion of the allotments herein provided for and 60 days prior to the date set by said proclamation for the entry of said surplus lands: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be surveyed all the unsurveyed lands, if any, within said reservation, and to cause an examination to be made of the lands by experts of the Geological Survey, and if there be found any lands bearing coal or other valuable minerals the said Secretary is hereby authorized to reserve them from allotment or disposition until further action by Congress: And provided further, That the rights of honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors of the late Civil and Spanish Wars or Philippine insurrection, as defined and described in sections 2304 and 2305 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 1, 1901, shall not be abridged.

SEC. 3. That before any of the land is disposed of, as hereinafter provided, and before the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, respectively, shall be permitted to select or locate any lands to which it may be entitled by reason of the loss of sections 16 or 36, or any portions thereof, by reason of allotments thereof to any Indian or Indians, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to reserve from said lands such tracts for town-site purposes as in his opinion may be required for the future public interests, and he may cause same to be surveyed into lots and blocks and disposed of under such regulations as he may prescribe, and he is hereby authorized to set apart and reserve for school, park, and other public purposes not more than 10 acres in any one town site, and patents shall be issued to the lands so set apart and reserved for school, park, and other public purposes to the municipality legally charged with the care and custody of lands donated for such purposes. The purchase price of all town lots sold in town sites, as hereinafter provided, shall be paid at such time and in such installments as the Secretary of the Interior may direct. He shall cause not more than 20 per cent of the net proceeds arising from such sales to be set apart and expended under his direction in the construction of schoolhouses and other public buildings, or in improvements within the town sites wherein such lots are located. The net proceeds derived from the sale of such lots and lands within the town sites as aforesaid shall be credited to the Indians as hereinafter provided: Provided further, That all children of school age and of Indian parentage shall be admitted at all times to the public schools within said town sites on an equal footing with all other children admitted to the said schools.

SEC. 4. That the price of said lands entered as homesteads under the provisions of this act shall be as follows: Upon all lands entered or filed upon within three months after the same shall be opened for settlement and entry, $6 per acre, and upon all lands entered or filed upon after the expiration of three months and within six months after the same shall have been opened for settlement and entry, $4 per acre; after the expiration of six months, after the same shall have been opened for settlement and entry, the price shall be $2.50 an acre.

SEC. 5. That the price of said lands shall be paid in accordance with the rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior upon the following terms: One-fifth of the purchase price to be paid in cash at the time of entry, and the balance in five equal installments, the first within two years and the remainder annually in three, four, five, and six years, respectively, from and after the date of entry. In case any entryman fails to make the annual payments, or any of them, when due, all rights in and to the land covered by his entry shall cease, and any payments theretofore made shall be forfeited and the entry canceled, and the lands shall be reoffered for sale and entry under the provisions of the homestead law at the price fixed herein: Provided, That nothing in this act shall prevent homestead settlers from commuting their entries under section 2301, Revised Statutes, by paying for the land entered the price fixed herein, receiving credit for the payments previously made. In addition to the price to be paid for the land the entryman shall pay the same fees and commissions at the time of commutation of final entry as now provided by law where the price of land is $1.25 per acre; and when the entryman shall have complied with all the requirements and terms of the homestead laws as to settlement and residence, and shall have made all the required payments aforesaid, he shall be entitled to patent for the lands entered: Provided further, That any lands remaining unsold after said lands have been opened to entry for five years may be sold to the highest bidder for cash, without regard to the prescribed price thereof fixed under the provisions of this act, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and patents therefor shall be issued to the purchasers.

SEC. 6. That from the proceeds arising from the sale and disposition of the lands aforesaid, exclusive of the customary fees and commissions, there shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, to the credit of the Indians belonging and having tribal rights on the said reservation, the sums of which the said tribe may be entitled, which shall draw interest at 3 per cent per annum; that the moneys derived from the sale of said lands and deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of said Indians shall be at all times subject to appropriation by Congress for their education, support, and civilization: Provided, That from any moneys in the Treasury to the credit of the Standing Rock Indians derived from the proceeds arising from the sale and disposition of their portion of the surplus and unallotted lands disposed of under section 6 of the act approved May 29, 1908, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to distribute and pay to each of the Indians belonging to said tribe and entitled thereto a sum not exceeding $40 per capita.

SEC. 7. That sections 16 and 36 of the land in each township within the tract described in section 1 of this act shall not be subject to entry, but shall be reserved for the use of the common schools and paid for by the United States at $2.50 per acre, and the same are hereby granted to the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, respectively, for such purpose, and in case any of said sections or parts thereof are lost to either of the said States by reason of allotments thereof to any Indian or Indians or otherwise, the governor of each of said States, respectively, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, is hereby authorized, within the area described in section 1 of this act, to locate other lands not otherwise appropriated, not exceeding two sections in any one township, which shall be paid for by the United States, as herein provided, in quantity equal to the loss, and such selections shall be made prior to the opening of such lands to settlement.

SEC. 8. That the lands allotted, those retained or reserved, and the surplus lands sold, set aside for town-site purposes, or granted to the State, or otherwise disposed of, shall be subject for a period of 25 years to all the laws of the United States prohibiting the introduction of intoxicants into the Indian country.

SEC. 9. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $180,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay for the lands granted to the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, as provided in section 7 of this act. And there is hereby appropriated the further sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of making the surveys and allotments provided for herein: Provided, That the said $10,000, or so much thereof as may be expended for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, shall be reimbursed to the United States from the proceeds received from the sale of the lands described herein or from any money in the Treasury belonging to said Indian tribe.

SEC. 10. That nothing in this act contained shall in any manner bind the United States to purchase any portion of the land herein described, except sections 16 and 36, or the equivalent, in each township, or to dispose of said land except as provided herein, or to guarantee to find purchasers for said lands or any portion thereof, it being the intention of this act that the United States shall act as trustee for said Indians to dispose of the said lands and to expend and pay over the proceeds received from the sale thereof only as received and as herein provided: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to deprive the said Indians of the Standing Rock Indian Reservation of any benefits to which they are entitled under existing treaties or agreements not inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from South Dakota is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] to 20 minutes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to authorize the sale of the surplus lands in the Standing Rock Reservation, in North and South Dakota. I will state that in the Sixtieth Congress a portion of the surplus lands of the Standing Rock Indians was authorized to be sold, and if this bill passes and becomes a law it will cover all the surplus lands belonging to those Indians.

The reservation affected by this legislation contains 1,131,280 acres, all of which has been allotted to the Indians with the exception of 219,000 acres. This bill proposes to authorize the sale of the 219,000 acres.

The Indians have already been allotted, but there is a provision in the bill that all the children that may be born up to within 60 days of the opening shall be allotted. The provisions of the bill are substantially the same as other laws which have been enacted for the sale of surplus lands in Indian reservations. This bill differs in one or two particulars from bills passed heretofore in reference to the Dakotas in that it does not provide for the appraisement of the lands. The reason for the change in that respect is because of the objection made by the Indians to the expense that would be incurred by reason of making an appraisement. They set forth the fact that the lands in a part of the reservation had so recently been appraised, and there being a report from the appraisers as to the general character of the land, namely, that it was only fit for grazing purposes and that probably $2.50 an acre would be an adequate price, it was thought that we should provide, as the bill does provide, that for all lands disposed of in the first three months the price should be $6 an acre, and then after three months $4 an acre, and then $2.50 an acre. When this bill in its original form, providing that the lands should be appraised, was submitted to the Indians for consideration they objected to it largely because of the provision which provided for appraisement. So, as I have stated, believing that no good could come from an appraisement, and believing that the plan which the bill follows is really a better one than to fix the price by appraisement, we have changed it in that respect.

We have a precedent for this legislation in the law which was enacted some years ago for opening a portion of the Rosebud Reservation. That law provided that a certain price should be paid for all lands taken in the first three months, and then the price was reduced in the next three months, and finally after six months the price was reduced to $2.50 an acre, the same as this bill provides.

I want to say that under that legislation about all of the desirable land was taken at the high price, and that when it came to the minimum price of $2.50 an acre there was practically no land left that anyone would undertake to acquire title to under the homestead laws. The law provided that after a certain number of years the undisposed of land should be disposed of without regard to homestead requirements and sold at auction to the highest bidder, and the remnants were sold and at an average price of $4.87 an acre.

There was no further legislation required and the matter was closed up and the lands were paid for in full, and I think it is the most satisfactory opening of an Indian reservation we have had for some years.

I may say, as I have already said, that this bill was submitted to the Indians and a council was held. Maj. McLaughlin represented the United States and the Department of the Interior. Maj. McLaughlin has been in the Indian Service for a period of 40 years. For a number of years he was the agent of these Standing Rock Indians. While there was some objection to the bill by the Indians as introduced in the Senate, it has been amended by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House, and as it is now presented practically every objection raised by the Indians has been met by an amendment. I submit that if anyone will take the trouble to examine this measure he will find very little to criticize in it. Now, Mr. Speaker, unless some one desires to ask me a question, I want to reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. First with reference to the different values placed upon the land according to the time they are entered, changing from $6 to $4 within three months, I believe. It may be that the Interior Department will open this land at some season very appropriate, and it may be that it will not. The truth is, public lands opened in recent years in the West to homestead settlement have been opened possibly in the best way it could be done, but certainly not at all to the satisfaction of the people living east of the western country who desired to obtain land. If it should be opened at this season of the year, of course, it would be wholly in the interest of the local people. Is there any way of determining when this land will be opened?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I can only answer the gentleman by stating that heretofore the department has had these openings at the season of the year when it believed it would serve the interest of the greatest number of people. They have usually provided for registration in the fall of the year and the filings in the following spring. So far as people in the immediate locality are concerned, I may say that nearly all of them have exercised their homestead rights and have no privilege to enter these lands, and before a person can be a purchaser he must have the qualifications of a homestead entryman.

Mr. MANN. I think there are a great many people up there who have not exercised their homestead rights and who never intend to live on a homestead anywhere, but who will exercise their rights for the purpose of getting possession of the lands and relinquishing that right afterwards.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Anyone who undertakes now to acquire title under a homestead is compelled to live upon the land in accordance with the law, or he does not succeed in getting the title.

Mr. MANN. He is not compelled to maintain his claim. He can relinquish that, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman from Illinois aware that the proclamation of the President can not be issued until the lands have been allotted to the Indians? This is the language in the bill, to be found on page 14:

Provided, That prior to said proclamation the Secretary of the Interior shall cause allotments to be made to every man, woman, and child belonging to or holding tribal relations in said reservations who have not heretofore received the allotments to which they are entitled under provisions of existing laws: Provided, however, That the said Secretary is hereby authorized to designate the superintendent of the Standing Rock Indian School to allot each child born subsequent to the completion of the allotments herein provided for and 60 days prior to the date set by said proclamation for the entry of said surplus lands.

Mr. MANN. I had assumed that the land which was to be sold to homesteaders was not to be allotted to Indians at all. Am I not correct in that assumption?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The language is very plain—

That prior to the said proclamation the Secretary of the Interior shall cause allotments to be made to every man, etc., who have not heretofore received the allotments to which they are entitled under provisions of existing laws.

Mr. MANN. Does that cover the land to be sold to homesteaders?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. After the lands have been allotted and the Indians have taken their allotments, then this proclamation can be issued, and not before.

Mr. MANN. That is what I assumed, and that is the reason I was asking the question.

Is the gentleman from South Dakota able to tell the House how many people went up to the Dakotas at the opening of the Rosebud land?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman, if he refers to the first opening, which was that portion in Gregory County, and which was opened, I think, by an act passed in the Fifty-eighth Congress, that there were something like 100,000 people.

Mr. MANN. How many people out of that number were permitted to get homesteads?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There were about 2,500 160-acre tracts, as I remember.

Mr. MANN. That was a very profitable thing for the railroad companies.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to say to the gentleman that there has been no opening since that time where there has been anything like that number of people. At the opening of the Cheyenne and the Standing Rock Reservations, which was next to the last one in our State, there were not sufficient people to begin to take anywhere near the land that was to be disposed of, and the reason they did not take it was the price of the land, which was undoubtedly too high.

Mr. MANN. The craze for public land is so great at this time and the market price of farm produce is so high that there will be just about the same proportion go up there if the present conditions of prosperity prevail for another year or two, and God knows what is going to happen in regard to that. Nobody on earth does.

I notice a provision in the bill reserving 20 per cent of the amount sold for town lots to make improvements in the towns. On the same theory why should not this land itself or the proceeds of it pay for the sixteenth and the thirty-sixth sections reserved for school purposes in order to make the land of more value and sell the land for a higher price?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that the payment of lands reserved for school purposes is simply carrying out the obligation of Congress when it guaranteed to these States of South and North Dakota sections 16 and 36 in every Indian reservation, and I may say further——

Mr. MANN. But that does not answer the question.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do not understand why the Indian should be required to pay for an obligation that the Government owes to the States of South and North Dakota.

Mr. MANN. The sixteenth and the thirty-sixth sections are reserved for school purposes, and in order to make the adjoining land of more value.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Oh, not at all; that is not the theory.

Mr. MANN. I think that is the very reason it was done in the first place, and the reason it has been continued. It is a fact that it does make the land more valuable. It saves the expenditure for school purposes which otherwise would have to be made. Now you propose to reserve 20 per cent of the sale price in towns to build town buildings. Upon what theory? Why, upon the theory that that makes the land which was sold worth more.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The same is true of the other; there is no distinction.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There is no comparison whatever. I will say to the gentleman, it has been contended, and I think it has been successfully demonstrated, that the Indians do receive directly a benefit to the extent of the 20 per cent of the proceeds that are taken from the sale of town lots, in that the lots sell for more money. But I want to say further, that concerning this particular provision in the bill, when the matter was submitted to the Indians they were heartily in favor of the provision, and I want to call the gentleman's attention——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understood the report stated they objected to that.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say in the original Senate bill was a provision that 20 per cent of the proceeds be taken from the sale of that portion of the reservation opened by the act that was passed in the Sixtieth Congress—that that be taken and used for public purposes—and the Indians very strenuously objected to taking the money that had been received out of the former opening and using it for any public purpose, but they do not object to the provision in this bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield for just a moment? In lines 14 to 17, inclusive, page 16, I think it will be observed that this provision is not without consideration. This provision is on condition that the public-school authorities in these towns forever receive the Indian children in the public schools on the full standing and full footing with the white children, and that is the real consideration for this.

Mr. MANN. If we give them the lands for the public schools, why do we then put in a provision requiring that the land shall be used for their education when we pay them for the use of the land and pay them for the other lands sold besides.

Mr. FERRIS. You do not pay them for the use of the lands; we sell a certain portion——

Mr. MANN. I am talking about school lands. We do pay them for the school lands which we donate to the State. In other words, the public domain at present, as now administered under this provision, is a liability to the Government instead of an asset.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If the gentleman will permit just a word. I desire to say under the treaty of 1877 the United States guaranteed in perpetuity to furnish these Indians with sufficient funds and until they became civilized, including cost of education and subsistence, and that under this bill the proceeds from the sale of sections 16 and 36 goes into the Treasury to the credit of the Indians, and then we appropriate it for their support and civilization and thereby relieve the Treasury from the obligation that exists under the treaty of 1877, under which we have appropriated millions of dollars. I may say that for the support of the Sioux, when I came to Congress, we were appropriating $900,000 annually out of the Public Treasury as against $250,000, I think it is now, or $350,000, in the pending Indian appropriation bill. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves three minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, this bill, Senate 109, as many Members will remember, flopped around here for a good while trying to get consideration. I think that the committee has had some difficulty, or likely there was some difficulty, I will not say the committee, in getting the Indians satisfied in reference to the opening of this reservation. When they first had this matter up I think it will be recalled by some of the Members who had something to do with it that this bill was not satisfactory to these Indians who are affected by this opening, but by providing in the bill, which comes before us at this time, that $40 shall be paid to each Indian it makes him more docile and ready to submit to whatever legislation may be necessary to deprive him of his land and sell it and put the money in the Treasury. I have before me statements which have been made by some of these Indians in which they say that this land very largely is needed by the Indians for grazing purposes; that the timber allotments on the part of the lands they have allotted and to which they are entitled have not been approved by the Department of the Interior; that a large number of heirs of deceased Indians, who are entitled to allotment, have not yet received their allotment. I do not know, of course, whether it is necessary for me to undertake to read these or whether it is worth anything at this particular time, but it seems to me a bill of this character, which involves 260,000 acres of public land, should not be taken up under suspension of the rules, where no one is given an opportunity to amend a bill of this character.

I see the gentleman's anxiety for wanting to pass this bill and get these lands thrown open for settlement.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. In just a moment. But I regard not the interests of Dakota alone in this matter. I think the whole people of the United States, who I think have some interest in the Indians and the lands which they have, should be considered. And for that reason I do not believe a bill of this character ought ever to come up under suspension of the rules.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will permit.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois wants to keep these Indians forever in reservations?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say this. In the State from which the gentleman comes I have no doubt the land is becoming more valuable year by year, and if by holding these lands for a little while for the benefit of the Indians, with the increase of money which they might be able to secure for that land, it would go for their support and education in the future, and I submit to the gentleman if he does not think it a good thing for the Indians?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would most emphatically say no. And let me say that with these Standing Rock Indians the heads of families have been allotted 640 acres, the wife of each husband 320 acres, each adult unmarried person 320 acres, and each child 160 acres. Consequently, in almost every family there are from 900 to 2,000 acres of land. Now, many of these allottees have died, probably one-fourth of them, since the first allotments were made, and those living have inherited such lands, and consequently these Indians are rich in lands. Now, it would certainly enhance the value of these allotments if you could dispose of these unused surplus lands, and if they should be used and occupied by the white people it would be contributing to the opportunities of the Indian, inasmuch as he would have the opportunity of learning from the white man.

Mr. FOSTER. I think many of the Members of Congress who are serving here now and who have served here in the past will recall that year after year Congress is expected to appropriate a large sum of money for the education of the Indian and for his care and support in many parts of the United States. And it has occurred to me, in view of those facts, that if there is anything to be gained by holding these lands the increase will come to him, and that he should have a right to the increase in the value of his land. But the great trouble seems to be that when the Indian has some valuable land the first opportunity is sought to take it away from him. And, then, I will say further, that beyond and all around these Indian reservations, as I understand, there is a good deal of public land to-day that is not settled in the Dakotas, and there can be no crying necessity for taking these lands away from the Indian at this particular time. Let the Dakotas go and induce people to go upon these lands, if necessary, and homestead them, but let the Indian alone for a little while and let him have the land where it will be of some advantage to him.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this fact—and I know he is not aware of it: That under the very treaty made with these Indians in 1889 there is a provision that when the allotments are made the surplus lands shall be disposed of, and this bill is to carry out what this treaty provides. And as to the land around this section and territory, I will say to the gentleman there is not any public land for homestead purposes. There is some public land in Cheyenne and the Standing Rock sections that was not taken, because the price appraised on the land was more than it is worth.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman think that in 10 years from now, or 5 years from now, that because of that land being more valuable it will be time to open these lands for settlement?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to say to the gentleman that I think there has nothing happened that has done more to pauperize the Indian than to build up constantly a fund in the Treasury, or to reserve something, so that he expects constantly that he is going to get something.

Mr. FOSTER. If he has his lands there, there will be no fund. Let him have the lands.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I observe on page 7 of the report, at the bottom, in the beginning of the letter addressed to the Secretary of the Interior by the Indian agent, it says:

> Under departmental instructions of August 11 last, I have the honor to report my conferences with the Indians of the Standing Rock Reservation in the States of North Dakota and South Dakota, with reference to the sale and disposition of the surplus land of their reservation.

But he says further:

> Owing to inclement weather, deep snow, and difficult traveling, the council was not so largely attended as it otherwise would undoubtedly have been.

Now, he received his instruction on the 11th of August, and he had this meeting or council in deep snow, when the traveling was so difficult that there were few Indians present. Why was it necessary, when the instructions were given in August, to postpone that council until there was deep snow, when it was difficult to attend it and when, as a matter of fact, few did attend it?

price, it was thought that we should provide, as the bill does provide, that for all lands disposed of in the first three months the price should be $6 an acre, and then after three months $4 an acre, and then $2.50 an acre. When this bill in its original form, providing that the lands should be appraised, was submitted to the Indians for consideration they objected to it largely because of the provision which provided for appraisement. So, as I have stated, believing that no good could come from an appraisement, and believing that the plan which the bill follows is really a better one than to fix the price by appraisement, we have changed it in that respect.

We have a precedent for this legislation in the law which was enacted some years ago for opening a portion of the Rosebud Reservation. That law provided that a certain price should be paid for all lands taken in the first three months, and then the price was reduced in the next three months, and finally after six months the price was reduced to $2.50 an acre, the same as this bill provides.

I want to say that under that legislation about all of the desirable land was taken at the high price, and that when it came to the minimum price of $2.50 an acre there was practically no land left that anyone would undertake to acquire title to under the homestead laws. The law provided that after a certain number of years the undisposed of land should be disposed of without regard to homestead requirements and sold at auction to the highest bidder, and the remnants were sold and at an average price of $4.87 an acre.

There was no further legislation required and the matter was closed up and the lands were paid for in full, and I think it is the most satisfactory opening of an Indian reservation we have had for some years.

I may say, as I have already said, that this bill was submitted to the Indians and a council was held. Maj. McLaughlin represented the United States and the Department of the Interior. Maj. McLaughlin has been in the Indian Service for a period of 40 years. For a number of years he was the agent of these Standing Rock Indians. While there was some objection to the bill by the Indians as introduced in the Senate, it has been amended by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House, and as it is now presented practically every objection raised by the Indians has been met by an amendment. I submit that if anyone will take the trouble to examine this measure he will find very little to criticize in it. Now, Mr. Speaker, unless some one desires to ask me a question, I want to reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. First with reference to the different values placed upon the land according to the time they are entered, changing from $6 to $4 within three months, I believe. It may be that the Interior Department will open this land at some season very appropriate, and it may be that it will not. The truth is, public lands opened in recent years in the West to homestead settlement have been opened possibly in the best way it could be done, but certainly not at all to the satisfaction of the people living east of the western country who desired to obtain land. If it should be opened at this season of the year, of course, it would be wholly in the interest of the local people. Is there any way of determining when this land will be opened?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I can only answer the gentleman by stating that heretofore the department has had these openings at the season of the year when it believed it would serve the interest of the greatest number of people. They have usually provided for registration in the fall of the year and the filings in the following spring. So far as people in the immediate locality are concerned, I may say that nearly all of them have exercised their homestead rights and have no privilege to enter these lands, and before a person can be a purchaser he must have the qualifications of a homestead entryman.

Mr. MANN. I think there are a great many people up there who have not exercised their homestead rights and who never intend to live on a homestead anywhere, but who will exercise their rights for the purpose of getting possession of the lands and relinquishing that right afterwards.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Anyone who undertakes now to acquire title under a homestead is compelled to live upon the land in accordance with the law, or he does not succeed in getting the title.

Mr. MANN. He is not compelled to maintain his claim. He can relinquish that, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman from Illinois aware that the proclamation of the President can not be issued until the lands have been allotted to the Indians? This is the language in the bill, to be found on page 14:

Provided, That prior to said proclamation the Secretary of the Interior shall cause allotments to be made to every man, woman, and child belonging to or holding tribal relations in said reservations who have not heretofore received the allotments to which they are entitled under provisions of existing laws: Provided, however, That the said Secretary is hereby authorized to designate the superintendent of the Standing Rock Indian School to allot each child born subsequent to the completion of the allotments herein provided for and 60 days prior to the date set by said proclamation for the entry of said surplus lands.

Mr. MANN. I had assumed that the land which was to be sold to homesteaders was not to be allotted to Indians at all. Am I not correct in that assumption?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The language is very plain—

That prior to the said proclamation the Secretary of the Interior shall cause allotments to be made to every man, etc., who have not heretofore received the allotments to which they are entitled under provisions of existing laws.

Mr. MANN. Does that cover the land to be sold to homesteaders?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. After the lands have been allotted and the Indians have taken their allotments, then this proclamation can be issued, and not before.

Mr. MANN. That is what I assumed, and that is the reason I was asking the question.

Is the gentleman from South Dakota able to tell the House how many people went up to the Dakotas at the opening of the Rosebud land?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman, if he refers to the first opening, which was that portion in Gregory County, and which was opened, I think, by an act passed in the Fifty-eighth Congress, that there were something like 100,000 people.

Mr. MANN. How many people out of that number were permitted to get homesteads?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There were about 2,500 160-acre tracts, as I remember.

Mr. MANN. That was a very profitable thing for the railroad companies.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to say to the gentleman that there has been no opening since that time where there has been anything like that number of people. At the opening of the Cheyenne and the Standing Rock Reservations, which was next to the last one in our State, there were not sufficient people to begin to take anywhere near the land that was to be disposed of, and the reason they did not take it was the price of the land, which was undoubtedly too high.

Mr. MANN. The craze for public land is so great at this time and the market price of farm produce is so high that there will be just about the same proportion go up there if the present conditions of prosperity prevail for another year or two, and God knows what is going to happen in regard to that. Nobody on earth does.

I notice a provision in the bill reserving 20 per cent of the amount sold for town lots to make improvements in the towns. On the same theory why should not this land itself or the proceeds of it pay for the sixteenth and the thirty-sixth sections reserved for school purposes in order to make the land of more value and sell the land for a higher price?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that the payment of lands reserved for school purposes is simply carrying out the obligation of Congress when it guaranteed to these States of South and North Dakota sections 16 and 36 in every Indian reservation, and I may say further——

Mr. MANN. But that does not answer the question.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do not understand why the Indian should be required to pay for an obligation that the Government owes to the States of South and North Dakota.

Mr. MANN. The sixteenth and the thirty-sixth sections are reserved for school purposes, and in order to make the adjoining land of more value.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Oh, not at all; that is not the theory.

Mr. MANN. I think that is the very reason it was done in the first place, and the reason it has been continued. It is a fact that it does make the land more valuable. It saves the expenditure for school purposes which otherwise would have to be made. Now you propose to reserve 20 per cent of the sale price in towns to build town buildings. Upon what theory? Why, upon the theory that that makes the land which was sold worth more.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The same is true of the other; there is no distinction.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There is no comparison whatever. I will say to the gentleman, it has been contended, and I think it has been successfully demonstrated, that the Indians do receive directly a benefit to the extent of the 20 per cent of the proceeds that are taken from the sale of town lots, in that the lots sell for more money. But I want to say further, that concerning this particular provision in the bill, when the matter was submitted to the Indians they were heartily in favor of the provision, and I want to call the gentleman's attention——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understood the report stated they objected to that.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say in the original Senate bill was a provision that 20 per cent of the proceeds be taken from the sale of that portion of the reservation opened by the act that was passed in the Sixtieth Congress—that that be taken and used for public purposes—and the Indians very strenuously objected to taking the money that had been received out of the former opening and using it for any public purpose, but they do not object to the provision in this bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield for just a moment? In lines 14 to 17, inclusive, page 16, I think it will be observed that this provision is not without consideration. This provision is on condition that the public-school authorities in these towns forever receive the Indian children in the public schools on the full standing and full footing with the white children, and that is the real consideration for this.

Mr. MANN. If we give them the lands for the public schools, why do we then put in a provision requiring that the land shall be used for their education when we pay them for the use of the land and pay them for the other lands sold besides.

Mr. FERRIS. You do not pay them for the use of the lands; we sell a certain portion——

Mr. MANN. I am talking about school lands. We do pay them for the school lands which we donate to the State. In other words, the public domain at present, as now administered under this provision, is a liability to the Government instead of an asset.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If the gentleman will permit just a word. I desire to say under the treaty of 1877 the United States guaranteed in perpetuity to furnish these Indians with sufficient funds and until they became civilized, including cost of education and subsistence, and that under this bill the proceeds from the sale of sections 16 and 36 goes into the Treasury to the credit of the Indians, and then we appropriate it for their support and civilization and thereby relieve the Treasury from the obligation that exists under the treaty of 1877, under which we have appropriated millions of dollars. I may say that for the support of the Sioux, when I came to Congress, we were appropriating $900,000 annually out of the Public Treasury as against $250,000, I think it is now, or $350,000, in the pending Indian appropriation bill. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves three minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, this bill, Senate 109, as many Members will remember, flopped around here for a good while trying to get consideration. I think that the committee has had some difficulty, or likely there was some difficulty, I will not say the committee, in getting the Indians satisfied in reference to the opening of this reservation. When they first had this matter up I think it will be recalled by some of the Members who had something to do with it that this bill was not satisfactory to these Indians who are affected by this opening, but by providing in the bill, which comes before us at this time, that $40 shall be paid to each Indian it makes him more docile and ready to submit to whatever legislation may be necessary to deprive him of his land and sell it and put the money in the Treasury. I have before me statements which have been made by some of these Indians in which they say that this land very largely is needed by the Indians for grazing purposes; that the timber allotments on the part of the lands they have allotted and to which they are entitled have not been approved by the Department of the Interior; that a large number of heirs of deceased Indians, who are entitled to allotment, have not yet received their allotment. I do not know, of course, whether it is necessary for me to undertake to read these or whether it is worth anything at this particular time, but it seems to me a bill of this character, which involves 260,000 acres of public land, should not be taken up under suspension of the rules, where no one is given an opportunity to amend a bill of this character.

I see the gentleman's anxiety for wanting to pass this bill and get these lands thrown open for settlement.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. In just a moment. But I regard not the interests of Dakota alone in this matter. I think the whole people of the United States, who I think have some interest in the Indians and the lands which they have, should be considered. And for that reason I do not believe a bill of this character ought ever to come up under suspension of the rules.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will permit.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois wants to keep these Indians forever in reservations?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say this. In the State from which the gentleman comes I have no doubt the land is becoming more valuable year by year, and if by holding these lands for a little while for the benefit of the Indians, with the increase of money which they might be able to secure for that land, it would go for their support and education in the future, and I submit to the gentleman if he does not think it a good thing for the Indians?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would most emphatically say no. And let me say that with these Standing Rock Indians the heads of families have been allotted 640 acres, the wife of each husband 320 acres, each adult unmarried person 320 acres, and each child 160 acres. Consequently, in almost every family there are from 900 to 2,000 acres of land. Now, many of these allottees have died, probably one-fourth of them, since the first allotments were made, and those living have inherited such lands, and consequently these Indians are rich in lands. Now, it would certainly enhance the value of these allotments if you could dispose of these unused surplus lands, and if they should be used and occupied by the white people it would be contributing to the opportunities of the Indian, inasmuch as he would have the opportunity of learning from the white man.

Mr. FOSTER. I think many of the Members of Congress who are serving here now and who have served here in the past will recall that year after year Congress is expected to appropriate a large sum of money for the education of the Indian and for his care and support in many parts of the United States. And it has occurred to me, in view of those facts, that if there is anything to be gained by holding these lands the increase will come to him, and that he should have a right to the increase in the value of his land. But the great trouble seems to be that when the Indian has some valuable land the first opportunity is sought to take it away from him. And, then, I will say further, that beyond and all around these Indian reservations, as I understand, there is a good deal of public land to-day that is not settled in the Dakotas, and there can be no crying necessity for taking these lands away from the Indian at this particular time. Let the Dakotas go and induce people to go upon these lands, if necessary, and homestead them, but let the Indian alone for a little while and let him have the land where it will be of some advantage to him.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this fact—and I know he is not aware of it: That under the very treaty made with these Indians in 1889 there is a provision that when the allotments are made the surplus lands shall be disposed of, and this bill is to carry out what this treaty provides. And as to the land around this section and territory, I will say to the gentleman there is not any public land for homestead purposes. There is some public land in Cheyenne and the Standing Rock sections that was not taken, because the price appraised on the land was more than it is worth.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman think that in 10 years from now, or 5 years from now, that because of that land being more valuable it will be time to open these lands for settlement?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I want to say to the gentleman that I think there has nothing happened that has done more to pauperize the Indian than to build up constantly a fund in the Treasury, or to reserve something, so that he expects constantly that he is going to get something.

Mr. FOSTER. If he has his lands there, there will be no fund. Let him have the lands.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I observe on page 7 of the report, at the bottom, in the beginning of the letter addressed to the Secretary of the Interior by the Indian agent, it says:

> Under departmental instructions of August 11 last, I have the honor to report my conferences with the Indians of the Standing Rock Reservation in the States of North Dakota and South Dakota, with reference to the sale and disposition of the surplus land of their reservation.

But he says further:

> Owing to inclement weather, deep snow, and difficult traveling, the council was not so largely attended as it otherwise would undoubtedly have been.

Now, he received his instruction on the 11th of August, and he had this meeting or council in deep snow, when the traveling was so difficult that there were few Indians present. Why was it necessary, when the instructions were given in August, to postpone that council until there was deep snow, when it was difficult to attend it and when, as a matter of fact, few did attend it?

Mr. FOSTER. And I will state to the gentleman that possibly in that way they secured the consent of the Indians to the opening.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit me another question?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Does not the gentleman see that we ought to have a calendar for the suspension of the rules, and that the Committee on Rules ought to bring in a rule providing that there shall be a suspension of the rules calendar, which is just as important as a Calendar for Unanimous Consent, so that we will know what bills will be called up? This is an exceedingly important bill, and if it had been called up on the Unanimous Consent Calendar it would have been objected to promptly. Here it is brought up under suspension of the rules, and I am told that it has been twice objected to on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] will corroborate me when I say that it was not promptly objected to, but was very reluctantly objected to by my good friend from Illinois, who made an objection only after some discussion of the matter, and concluded that it ought not to pass under unanimous consent.

I want to state to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] that this bill, as I have already stated, is in substantial conformity with the bills that we have been passing in the last 10 years in relation to the disposition of the surplus of Indian lands in reservations, with the exception that it is perfected, and is, therefore, a better measure——

Mr. COOPER. It ought to be——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. A better measure than any that we have heretofore passed. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that it has a unanimous report from the committee, which considered it very carefully.

Mr. COOPER. I notice in this letter, if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] will permit a question——

Mr. FOSTER. Yes——

Mr. COOPER. That the Indians expressed themselves as despondent and as very much discouraged at not receiving any cash payment from the proceeds of the sale. The act was passed on May 29, 1908. That is four years and five months ago.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. Let me state to the gentleman from Wisconsin——

Mr. COOPER. They were instructed to call the Indians together in August, and when they did call them together the snow was so deep that they could not get to the council.

Mr. FOSTER. It was provided that the Indians should receive $40 each out of this money, and of course they immediately concluded that $40 was worth something to them.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] that the bill providing for the sale of the surplus lands that was passed in 1908 provided that the money should be paid into the Treasury and expended for the support, civilization, and education of these Indians, in accordance with the agreement of 1889, and the Secretary of the Interior, believing that he had the right to pay to these Indians a cash payment, when they asked for a $40 per capita payment because of two successive droughts, submitted the matter to the comptroller, and the comptroller held that under the law as it existed no money could be paid directly to the Indians; and therefore we put into this bill a provision, after the comptroller had ruled upon the question, that $40 per capita might be paid to the Indians.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FERRIS). Six minutes.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOSTER. I will, for just a short question.

Mr. MILLER. I thought the gentleman was about through. This is not very important. The gentleman observed, in the course of his remarks, that during the years past Members had noticed that the Government had annually to pay out quite large sums for the support and maintenance of various Indians. Has the gentleman ever observed exactly who those Indians are, and where they are, for whom these particular sums have been expended?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know that I could enumerate them.

Mr. MILLER. I could tell the gentleman generally.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me state it. I do not care that the gentleman shall answer his own question.

Mr. MILLER. I can readily answer it.

Mr. FOSTER. I will suggest to the gentleman that if he will scan the appropriation bills of the past sessions of Congress he will find that for almost every section of the country where there are Indians there has been appropriated money for the support and education of the Indians.

Mr. MILLER. Oh, no; there are 11,000 Indians in my State, and not one penny has been spent by the Government for their support and education in 10 years.

Mr. FOSTER. We have here now a matter of appropriating money, it might be said, for the betterment of the Indians, but the Government is spending money all the time.

Mr. MILLER. It is, and it is spending large sums, too; but I want to direct the attention of the gentleman to the particular Indians for whom this money is intended.

Mr. FOSTER. I can not say as to these Indians; but I have no doubt if the record was looked up it would be found that a good deal has been spent for these Indians. I imagine that the State of Minnesota has not been too immodest in calling upon the Treasury for what it thought it wanted.

Mr. MILLER. The record speaks for itself.

Mr. FOSTER. The Representatives from the State of Minnesota have usually been active and alert on this floor.

Mr. MILLER. I do not agree with the gentleman that activity is to be measured by inroads upon the United States Treasury; but in passing, if the gentleman will permit——

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. I should like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that I think it is worthy of some thought, if not discussion at this time, that the Indians for whom the Government is forced to make these appropriations for support and maintenance are Indians who have been despoiled of their land, generally speaking, by acts of the Government twenty-five, thirty, fifty, sixty, or eighty years ago, and that it is never due to anything like opening up an unused portion of a reservation.

Mr. FOSTER. I think there was always some innocent looking bill. I am not casting any reflection on the gentleman from South Dakota in this respect, but usually the plea is made, "Why, this is for the benefit of the Indians themselves." And yet in the end the Indian's land is gone and his support has to be provided by the United States Government.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him if he has heard of any scandal in connection with any of the openings in South Dakota in the last few years?

Mr. FOSTER. No; and if I have intimated such a thing to the gentleman, I beg his pardon. I am not intimating it; but I would suggest to the gentleman, as suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], that these things have occurred in the past, and I have not specified any particular part of the country. I do not know whether he refers to Dakota or whether he refers to Minnesota, or some other State.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think he could perhaps not only refer to Dakota and Minnesota, but he might include Illinois, because he went back 80 years.

Mr. FOSTER. That may be true. I suppose in Illinois there were men who were just as anxious to take away from the Indian the lands that belonged to him as there are to take away the land that belongs to the Indians in other States, and those efforts probably have been just as successful in Illinois as they were in other States.

Mr. MANN. The people of Illinois may have robbed the Indians, but we did not rob both the Treasury and the Indians.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; that is true.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I wanted to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the Indians of South Dakota have been making great progress, and there has been no suggestion that by reason of any of the acts that have been passed in recent years they have been wronged or defrauded.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How many Indians are there in Standing Rock?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think between 4,000 and 5,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much does this $40 per capita payment amount to?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I have not figured it up.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In round numbers?

Mr. MILLER. Four thousand times forty would be $160,000.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Something between $150,000 and $200,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why do they want this money?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is suggested that this money is necessary as the result of two successive severe droughts.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is necessary to improve their farms and improve their condition generally.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much of the former reservation is undisposed of?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I am not able to state just what portion of the Standing Rock Reservation is undisposed of, but I would say for a guess probably one-third. I am not able to state.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not recollect the extent of that area.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The Standing Rock Reservation joins the Cheyenne, and a small portion of the Standing Rock was opened with the Cheyenne, but just what proportion I am not able to state.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How many acres are undisposed of?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I am unable to state. The reason that it has not been disposed of is due to the price, which was too high, and, second, to the drought condition which prevails.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If that condition prevails now it would be unwise to open it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The conditions this past year have been better than the year before.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from South Dakota has covered the field pretty well in his remarks. I want to say that the Indians who appeared before the committee did express their views, and I think every objection they had was met fully by the committee, and I think that the bill is very well poised, indeed.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. What objection did the Indians make?

Mr. FERRIS. The objection in a nutshell, as I saw it, was that some of the cattlemen wanted to occupy or lease these surplus lands, and they induced these Indians to come down here at their expense and make a protest. That is the real information.

There is always the same two factions with reference to an Indian reservation. The cattle people want to rent the land undivided as a reservation for a few cents an acre, and never want it settled up. On the other hand, there are people who want to settle up the land, build houses, build fences, plow, cultivate, and make something of the country.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. These surplus lands are leased for about 4 cents an acre.

Mr. FERRIS. Now, this bill is in favor of the people who want to settle the country. Each Indian—big, little, old, and young—has 160 acres apiece, and that makes anywhere from 320 to 2,000 acres in a family. They personally do not cultivate and take care of any considerable part of it at all. All they do is to lease it.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the Government have something to do with the leasing of it?

Mr. FERRIS. It does.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the Government ought to see that they did not rent it too cheaply, and you ought not to blame the Indians for it.

Mr. FERRIS. I am not blaming the Indians, I am simply stating the fact. Now, this wild domain, of course, is uncultivated and unsubdued, and that is the best deal the Indians could make. Of course, you can not afford to pay for grazing land as much as you would pay for land that could be cultivated. But the white people will buy these lands at a fair price. The final solution of the Indian question is bound to be the intermingling of the white people and gradually swallowing up the Indian, and the only way you can do it is to have the land allotted to the individual Indians and let the white settler come in and buy the surplus lands. There is much said about the white people going in and buying up Indian land, but there are two sides to the question. When the land is allotted it renders it more valuable. The white people who convert a cow pasture into fertile fields are entitled to some consideration. When cities and towns are built it creates value for the Indians also. This is a good bill. I think the bill ought to pass. So many people think there is but one side of these Indian questions, but the frontiersmen who are drawers of water and hewers of wood are entitled to some consideration. This bill in no manner affects their individual allotments. It only disposes of their surplus and creates value for their allotments.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired and all time has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from South Dakota to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FOSTER) there were 36 ayes and 8 noes.

So, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

THE ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 21532, to incorporate the Rockefeller Foundation.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That John D. Rockefeller, John D. Rockefeller, jr., Frederick T. Gates, Starr J. Murphy, Harry Pratt Judson, Simon Flexner, Edwin A. Alderman, Wickliffe Rose, and Charles O. Heydt, together with such persons as they may associate with themselves, and their successors, be, and they hereby are, constituted a body corporate of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That the name of such body corporate shall be "The Rockefeller Foundation," and by that name it shall have perpetual succession, save as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 3. That the object of the said corporation shall be to promote the well-being and to advance the civilization of the peoples of the United States and its Territories and possessions and of foreign lands in the acquisition and dissemination of knowledge; in the prevention and relief of suffering; and in the promotion, by eleemosynary and philanthropic means, of any and all of the elements of human progress: Provided, however, That the Congress of the United States may at any time impose such limitations upon the objects of the said corporation as it may deem the public interest demands, and any and all gifts, devises, bequeats, or property at any time received or held by said corporation shall be received and held subject to the terms of this proviso and to the terms and limitations which may be imposed by any act of Congress hereafter passed with reference thereto.

SEC. 4. That for the promotion of such objects the said corporation shall have power to establish, maintain, and endow, or to aid others, whether individuals, associations, or corporations, to establish, maintain, and endow institutions and other agencies for carrying on said objects, and any of them; to purchase, hold, sell, and convey real estate necessary or convenient for the said corporate objects, and to erect, improve, enlarge, and equip buildings and other structures necessary or convenient for said objects, or any of them, and to acquire, make, and furnish all necessary or convenient apparatus and other accessories; to employ and aid others to employ teachers, lecturers, assistants, and agents; to donate to any individual, association, or corporation engaged in similar work money or property, real or personal, which shall at any time be held by the said corporation hereby constituted, subject to the terms of any gift, grant, bequest, or devise by which the said corporation shall have received the same; to collect statistics and information, and to publish and distribute books, documents, and reports containing the same, and in general to do and perform all things necessary or convenient for the promotion of the object of the corporation.

SEC. 5. That the said corporation shall further have power to have and use a common seal and to alter and change the same at its pleasure; to sue and be sued in any court of the United States or other court of competent jurisdiction; to take or receive, whether by gift, grant, devise, bequest, or purchase, any real or personal estate, and to hold, grant, convey, transfer, hire, or lease the same for its corporate purposes; to accept and administer any trust of money, or of real or personal estate for any purpose within the object of the corporation as aforesaid: Provided, however, That the total amount of property held at any one time, including that which is held absolutely as well as that which is held in trust, shall not exceed the value of $100,000,000, exclusive of increases in the value of property subsequent to its receipt by said corporation; to prescribe, by by-laws, or otherwise, the terms and conditions upon which money, real estate, or personal estate shall be acquired or received by the said corporation, and for the grant, transfer, assignment, or donation of any or all property of the said corporation, real or personal, to any individual, society, or corporation for any of the said purposes for which the said corporation is hereby incorporated; to make by-laws, subject to the provisions of this act, for the admission or exclusion of its members; for the election of its trustees, officers, and agents; for the casting of votes by its members or trustees by proxy; for the purchase, management, sale, or transfer of its property; for the investment and control of its funds; and otherwise generally for the management of the property and the transaction of the business of the corporation. The enumeration of special powers in this act shall be deemed to be by way of amplification and not by way of limitation of the general powers hereby granted.

SEC. 6. That the income of the property of the said corporation shall not be accumulated or added to the principal, but shall be currently applied to the purposes for which the corporation is created, subject only to such reasonable delay as may be necessary in the wise administration of the fund.

SEC. 7. That at any time after the expiration of 50 years from the receipt by the said corporation of any property, whether by deed, grant, devise, or bequest, the said corporation may distribute the principal, or any part thereof, as well as the income thereof, in furtherance of the objects of said corporation, provided such action shall be authorized by a resolution passed by the affirmative vote of two-thirds of all those who shall at the time be members of the corporation, at a special meeting held on not less than 30 days' notice, given in writing, which shall state that the meeting is called for the purpose of considering a resolution to authorize the distribution of the whole or some part of the principal of said funds; and after the expiration of 100 years from the date of its receipt by said corporation the said corporation shall distribute the principal, in furtherance of the objects of said corporation, if so directed to do by the Congress of the United States; and all gifts, grants, devises, or bequests to the corporation shall be taken and held subject to the provisions of this section.

SEC. 8. That the members of the corporation shall be not less than 9 in number and not more than 25, as may be prescribed by the by-laws of the corporation: Provided, That if and when the number of members shall be less than 9 the members remaining shall have power to add, and shall add, to their number until the number shall not be less than 9: And provided, That no act of the corporation shall be void because at the time such act shall be done the number of the members of the corporation shall be less than 9, except that no gift to any individual, association, institution, or corporation, shall be made when the number of members is less than 9; that all the members of the corporation shall be its trustees; that no member of the said corporation shall, by reason of such membership or his trusteeship, be personally liable for any of its debts or obligations; that each member of the corporation shall hold his membership for a term of three years and until his successor shall be chosen: Provided, however,

That the members shall be at all times divided into three classes, equal numerically as nearly as may be, and that the original members shall at their first meeting, or as soon thereafter as shall be convenient, be divided into three classes, the members of the first class to hold their membership and office until the expiration of one year, the members of the second class until the expiration of two years, and the members of the third class until the expiration of three years from the 30th day of June next after the enactment of this law, and that in every case the member shall hold office after the expiration of his term until his successor shall be chosen: And provided further, That in case any member shall, by death, resignation, incapacity to act, or otherwise, cease to be a member during his term, his successor may be chosen to serve for the remainder of such term and until his successor shall be chosen.

SEC. 9. That the successors to the incorporators named herein and the additional members of the corporation and their successors shall be elected by the members of the corporation for the time being, but before such election shall become effective written notice thereof shall be mailed by said corporation to each of the following-named persons at his official post-office address, namely: The President of the United States, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the presidents of the following institutions, namely: Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass.; Yale University, New Haven, Conn.; Columbia University, New York City, N. Y.; Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Md.; and the University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill. If such election shall be disapproved by a majority of the persons above named, it shall be void; but it shall become effective if and when it shall be approved by such majority, or at the expiration of 60 days from the mailing of such notices if it shall not have been disapproved by such majority.

SEC. 10. That the principal office of the corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia, but offices may be maintained and meetings of the corporation, the trustees, and committees may be held in such other places as the by-laws may from time to time designate.

SEC. 11. That all personal property and funds of the corporation held, used, or invested for its purposes as aforesaid, or to produce income to be used for such purposes, shall be exempt from taxation by the United States or any Territory or District thereof.

SEC. 12. That no officer, trustee, member, or employee of said corporation shall receive any pecuniary benefit from the operations thereof, except reasonable compensation for services in effecting one or more of the purposes of the corporation.

SEC. 13. That the corporation shall annually file with the Secretary of the Interior of the United States a report in writing, stating in detail the property, real and personal, held by the corporation, and the expenditure or other use or disposition of the same or of the income thereof during the preceding year.

SEC. 14. That this charter shall be subject to alteration, amendment, or repeal at the pleasure of the Congress of the United States.

SEC. 15. That this act shall take effect immediately on its passage.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Is the gentleman from New York opposed to the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is not obliged to answer.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I have a further question to ask. If the gentleman from New York is not opposed to the bill and another gentleman is opposed to the bill, which has the preference?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is the gentleman from Georgia opposed to the bill?

Mr. RODDENBERY. The gentleman from New York will please answer my question first; I asked him the question first.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As at present informed I am. I may be convinced that the bill is a good bill. If the gentleman is opposed to it, I am satisfied to have him recognized.

The SPEAKER. The rule and the custom is that the Speaker or the Chairman, whoever happens to be in the chair, shall recognize the first Member up, excepting, of course, on the motion to recommit.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman from Georgia is opposed to the bill and does not believe he is likely to be persuaded to favor it at all, I am perfectly willing that the Speaker should recognize him.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Not at all. As at present informed I am opposed to the bill. I merely wanted the information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands a second.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio objects. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will take their places as tellers. The question is on ordering a second.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported 41 in favor of and 4 opposed to ordering a second.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from New York is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for me to long detain the House, but I shall call briefly to the attention of the House the purpose of the bill which we have before us for consideration. The first section provides for the incorporators. The second and third sections state the object and purposes of the bill. The object of the bill as set out in the section itself is—to promote the well-being and to advance the civilization of the peoples of the United States and its Territories and possessions and of foreign lands in the acquisition and dissemination of knowledge; in the prevention and relief of suffering; and in the promotion, by eleemosynary and philanthropic means, of any and all of the elements of human progress.

Congress may at any time impose such limitations upon the objects of the said corporation as it deems public interest demands, and that all property received must be held by it subject to these provisions.

The corporation is to be granted power to establish, maintain, and endow any institutions or agencies for carrying on the purpose for which it is created, and for such purpose it has the ordinary corporate powers given to eleemosynary institutions by the general laws of the States.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire the gentleman to tell me what is meant by certain language in the bill. On page 4, in line 17, we find this language:

The enumeration of special powers in this act shall be deemed to be by way of amplification and not by way of limitation of the general powers hereby granted.

That is to say that there is nothing in the act which can limit the powers of the corporation, and instead of limiting the powers of the corporation it is given unlimited power.

Mr. PETERS. I think that same provision has been in other special acts passed by this Congress granting similar corporate powers to other institutions, and its purpose is to provide that there shall be no question as to the rights of the people acting under the corporate powers to carry out the purposes for which the institution is incorporated.

Mr. BARTLETT. In other words, that it should be chartered for a pretended eleemosynary purpose, but that any purpose may be carried out by these incorporators or by the managers of the corporation.

Mr. PETERS. No; only to carry out purposes along the line indicated in the charter.

Mr. BARTLETT. In other words, while you apparently limit the power of the corporation to specific objects, yet this language means that you do not limit but you amplify the powers and give the corporation anything it wants. Is not that the meaning of it?

Mr. PETERS. Not at all. I tried to state that it is provided that the general powers granted in this bill shall not be limited by the terms of the act beyond the purposes for which it is incorporated. The failure to mention a specific charitable object in the bill shall not prevent them from going into that field of work if consistent with the limitations imposed in the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. One other question, so that the gentleman may answer the suggestions that occur to my mind, and that is in reference to section 11.

That all personal property and funds of the corporation held, used, or invested for its purposes as aforesaid, or to produce income to be used for such purposes, shall be exempt from taxation by the United States or any Territory or district thereof.

Mr. PETERS. If the gentleman will permit me, I am taking up the bill section by section, and if I do not make it clear when we come to that number I will ask the gentleman to put the question again.

Mr. BARTLETT. Well, I did not know the gentleman intended to do that.

Mr. PETERS. Section 6 provides the income of the property shall not be added to the principal, and that the income shall be spent for the purposes for which it is incorporated, so that no larger amount shall be acquired. The number of members——

Mr. BARTLETT. As the gentleman has got beyond section 1, might I ask him a question in reference to it?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman calls this "a body corporate of the District of Columbia," and yet he proposes to give it powers to extend anywhere beyond the District of Columbia and all the States, and he also proposes to give it power to do certain things in foreign countries. That is true?

Mr. PETERS. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, is not there a law in the District of Columbia that provides for the incorporation of all sorts of corporations?

Mr. PETERS. That law has been tried, and it is only drawn for the purposes of corporations whose intent it is to operate solely within the District, and it does not give sufficient powers for corporations who desire to do their field work outside of the District of Columbia. The Carnegie people tried originally an incorporation under the District, and found they were not able to operate in that way, and had to get a special act.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then I understand the whole purpose of this is to give it the sanction and seal of the United States instead of a corporation merely of the District of Columbia—to give it an incorporation by act of Congress—and the words "a body corporate of the District of Columbia" do not mean anything as put in the bill.

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman has correctly stated the purpose when he says it is to have the corporation operate all over the country. The limitations imposed by the general laws of the District make incorporation under them for these purposes impracticable, and also require that a majority of the incorporators be citizens of the District.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman think that Congress does exercise any function of creating corporations to exercise public functions such as national banks or railroads to carry on interstate-commerce business or to build bridges, as in the North River Bridge case, in which the Supreme Court said Congress had the right to incorporate that sort of a charter because it was a navigable stream? Does the gentleman think that Congress has the constitutional power to grant charters, any sort of charters, to do any sort of business, national or international, anyway, whether it be confined to the United States or extended to foreign countries? Does the gentleman think we have that power?

Mr. PETERS. I think Congress clearly has power to grant corporate powers such as is intended to be granted by this act.

Mr. BATHRICK. May I ask the gentleman a question? Are not all the gentleman's questions, as expressed in his inferential fears, answered by section 14, which gives the Congress of the United States the power to alter, amend, or repeal this charter at pleasure?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly; I should think so.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the gentleman will permit, it certainly does not answer the question as to the power of Congress to enact the law.

Mr. PETERS. The number of members of the corporation are not to be less than 9 or more than 25, and should the number fall below 9 neither property can be acquired nor gifts made. The corporation can not act until the full number of at least 9 incorporators are elected. In order to preserve the high character of the men who shall handle this national eleemosynary institution it is provided that all members elected to the corporation shall only be elected subject to the approval of the President of the United States, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the presidents of five of our leading universities. Section 11 is that all personal property used for the purposes of corporation is to be exempt from taxation by the United States the same as it would be as if it were incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia. This provision does not affect taxation outside the District of Columbia. All its real or personal property is subject to taxation under the laws of any State in which it may be situated. Then there is a provision that there shall be an annual report, and the further provision that no officer or trustee shall receive any pecuniary benefit except for his services.

The report is to be made annually to the Secretary of the Interior, and, further, this charter shall be subject to alteration, amendment, or repeal, at the pleasure of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. COX of Indiana and Mr. FITZGERALD rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS] yield?

Mr. PETERS. I yield first to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman said that when he came to section 11 he would explain it at length.

Mr. PETERS. I mentioned when we came to section 11 that real and personal property is to be exempt from taxation in the District of Columbia, in the United States, or any Territory or District thereof. All property in any State shall be subject to the local taxation. Any property of the corporation, both real and personal, outside the District of Columbia will be subject to taxation in the same manner as if owned by a private individual. Not the slightest exemption from local taxation is contemplated.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I think the gentleman is mistaken. This says:

That all personal property and funds of the corporation held, used, or invested for its purposes as aforesaid, or to produce income to be used for such purposes, shall be exempt from taxation by the United States or any Territory or District thereof.

Mr. PETERS. I understand that the wording is similar to that of the general law as to the charitable and eleemosynary institutions which may be established in the District. The act would not exempt the property of this corporation from taxation in any State, either real or personal.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I want to ask the gentleman a question, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS] yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I want to know whether or not the proposed bill which the gentleman now has in charge is not in line with the similar kind of work which Mr. Rockefeller has been engaged in in New York for several years.

Mr. PETERS. The purpose of introducing this bill is to incorporate and make in permanent form the charitable work that is being now done in various parts of the United States by people who receive gifts from Mr. Rockefeller. It is not necessary to mention the sections in which research work is being done under the various gifts of Mr. Rockefeller in many parts of the United States. It is the purpose of this act to enable that work to be systematized and made permanent. While research is depending on the gift of any individual it is subject to the uncertainties hanging on a human life. Of course it is of tremendous advantage to the people of the whole country to have the investigations carried on by a permanent organization and to have a permanent endowment rather than depend on gifts from any benefactor, however generous.

Mr. COX of Indiana. It is to coordinate them and bring them all together into one organized body of men, is it not?

Mr. PETERS. Exactly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does the gentleman know or can he tell the House approximately about how much money Mr. Rockefeller has donated along this line? Has he any idea of it?

Mr. PETERS. I can not inform the House. The sums are so huge I would not wish to attempt it.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I see that one of the incorporators here is Simon Flexner, of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not he is at the head of the Flexner Institute in New York?

Mr. PETERS. He is.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I would like to know whether or not that is the institution that has been endowed by Mr. Rockefeller for several years, in order to continue the scientific work that Mr. Flexner had instituted?

Mr. PETERS. Exactly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. And so the scheme of this is to coordinate it and bring it under one class of men?

Mr. PETERS. To coordinate the work——

Mr. COX of Indiana. Not to cost the Government one penny?

Mr. PETERS. And not to cost the Government one penny.

Mr. COX of Indiana. But to disseminate knowledge and aid suffering humanity?

Mr. PETERS. And to make permanent the relief from the suffering which people are undergoing to-day.

Mr. WILLIS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question as to section 11, which says:

That all personal property and funds of the corporation held, used, or invested for its purposes as aforesaid, or to produce income to be used for such purposes, shall be exempt from taxation by the United States or any Territory or District thereof.

It may be that the gentleman has answered this in his colloquy with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. Now, I want to consider that in connection with section 5, which provides that the corporation "shall have power to take or receive, whether by Government grant, devise, bequest, or purchase, any real or personal estate, and to hold, grant, and have the same," and so forth, and then consider the provision on the following page, where it undertakes to limit the amount so that it shall not exceed the value of $100,000,000, inclusive of increases in the value of the property subsequent to its receipt by the said corporation. Now, I want to inquire whether the gentleman thinks that under those two sections, taken together, it will not be possible that the vast amount of property which now or hereafter might be subject to taxation by the Federal Government would be absolutely removed from the liability to taxation by the United States or by any Territory or district thereof? It might extend clear beyond $100,000,000. It might be $500,000,000, because in this section provision is made not only for the original value of the property, but also for the possible potential increase of value. What is likely to be the effect of that?

Mr. PETERS. It is inconceivable that such circumstances should arise, but Congress has always the power by legislation here to meet that situation, should it be found that any undue increase in the capital fund was taking place. It is the desire and the intent of this act to expend the income as fast as it can be acquired. All property, real and personal, outside the District is subject to local taxation, and the entire income of the fund must be spent.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, can I ask the gentleman a question in reference to section 11?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. As far as I can gather from a reading of the bill and from the statement of the gentleman, the whole intention and purpose of the bill is to undertake to exempt this property from State taxation.

Mr. PETERS. There is no such intention whatever.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if, as a matter of fact, all the income is not to be devoted to research in the interest of the great body of the people?

Mr. PETERS. All the income will be expended for that purpose.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the gentleman see any objection to a limitation of the amount?

Mr. PETERS. Large as this donation will be, I only wish we could get more for such purposes.

To indicate the plans of the incorporators I will read to the Members a portion of the statement of Jerome D. Greene, general manager of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, and dated March 15, 1912, and sent to Members of the House:

> The incorporation of the Rockefeller foundation is intended as a means of maintaining, for as long a period in the future as the trustees or Congress may deem best, an approved method of careful philanthropic expenditure. The scope of the charter is purposely made wide, but wide only within the strict limits of charitable intent. The aggrandizement of the members of the corporation or of the corporation itself, through the administration of the trust, is expressly excluded by the provision that no person connected with the foundation shall derive any pecuniary benefit therefrom other than fair compensation for services, and that the income of the endowment shall be spent each year, not added to the principal.
> The characteristic of Mr. Rockefeller's benefactions in the past is that they have been the means of stimulating rather than replacing self-help and self-reliance. Thus the work of the Commission for the Eradication of the Hookworm has been carried on exclusively through State agencies with the cooperation of hundreds of local physicians, and has been made the occasion of permanently improving the local public health organizations. The promotion of improved methods of corn and cotton growing in the South by the general education board has not been by flooding the agricultural communities with money they have not earned as a substitute for local enterprise, but by showing, through a few farms here and there, with a moderate expenditure for instruction and demonstration, how a hundred neighboring farms could, with their own labor, double or quadruple their products. The endowment of education through schools, colleges, and universities has stimulated the sense of local responsibility instead of destroying it, as is graphically indicated by the fact that for about seven and a half millions of dollars contributed conditionally through the general education board to institutions of learning in all parts of the country since 1905 about thirty-eight millions of dollars have been raised by those institutions in fulfillment of the board's conditions. The sending of a single physician to Texas two months ago by the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research has resulted in the effective instruction of the public health authorities and many private physicians in that State once for all as to the method of dealing with a virulent outbreak of epidemic cerebrospinal meningitis. Incidentally the new curative serum was administered to hundreds of persons, with a resulting decrease of the normal death rate from 75 per cent to less than 25 per cent.
> The question how the Rockefeller Foundation is to spend its money is a legitimate one for the public to ask before the charter is granted, especially in the light of ignorant forebodings lest a large sum of money might seek the protection of a charter for private rather than for public ends. This question is answered, first, by the unequivocal language of the charter, pledging the use of the money exclusively for charitable and humanitarian purposes, subject to the control of Congress; and, secondly, by the concrete illustration of how these same resources have been used while under private control through the general education board, the sanitary commission for the eradication of the hookworm disease, and the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research. It may be confidently expected that far-reaching measures for the promotion of public health along both educational and medical lines will have the first attention of the trustees.

The results of the activities of the Rockefeller charities have brought already relief to many sufferers. I am reluctant to think that a Member of this House will choose to deny the suffering and sick of our country the benefits of this gift. Congress has now the opportunity to secure this huge organization permanently for the use of the poor of the country. Let us do it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS], I shall support the bill, but if any gentleman is opposed to it I shall yield to him the time in opposition.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I would like to have five minutes, not to oppose the bill, but to support it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Does any gentleman desire to speak in opposition to this bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman from Virginia oppose it?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No. I stated that I would not oppose it, but would support it. Of course if anyone wishes to oppose it, I will yield.

The SPEAKER. Does any gentleman desire to oppose this bill?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I recognize that the ground upon which I oppose this bill may be old fashioned and not in accord with the very advanced spirit of the times. If we can grant a charter to a corporation like this—if Congress can grant such a charter—then there is no limit to the power of Congress to grant charters for any purpose. Even, Mr. Speaker, when the Supreme Court of the United States upheld the right of Congress to charter the United States Bank, it was held in that case by Chief Justice Marshall that the only reason why Congress had the power to charter the United States Bank was because it granted to the bank governmental functions and put upon the bank the duty to do certain things which the Government had the right to do and because the bank was its fiscal agent.

Going further, when the Supreme Court upheld the national-bank act they still adhered to that doctrine. Again, Mr. Speaker, in the case of Ogden against the bank, when the Supreme Court reaffirmed the right of Congress to charter a national bank it stated that it was only because Congress granted to the bank functions that were governmental in their nature that Congress had the right to grant such a charter, and that, of course, unless it did Congress had no such power.

Upon the same doctrine and with the same limitation that the Supreme Court of the United States upheld the right of Congress to charter the national banks, the court, incident to the opening up of vast tracts of land in the West, upheld the right of Congress to incorporate the Pacific Railroad companies on the ground that Congress had control of interstate commerce and traffic from one State to another. There was also involved in that case the right of the Government to build its post roads and military highways, and they were dedicated also to the use of the Government in carrying the military forces and supplies of the Government.

When it came to the charter of the North River Bridge Co., the court upheld the right of Congress to charter a company to build a bridge across a navigable river, and held then that the right of Congress was not because of any inherent right to grant a charter, but because Congress had the right to control the navigable rivers and streams of this country, and that was a navigable river and stream, and it was also a post road and a public highway, made so by the act incorporating the bridge company.

Now, I have on all these occasions, when charters of this kind have been applied for in Congress, voiced my objection to them upon this ground. Even when the Red Cross Society was being incorporated and when the act incorporating it was being amended I suggested the same objection. That was a commendable purpose, as this is, but I do not believe that Congress has the constitutional power and authority to grant charters of this character. I have no objection to the purposes for which it is intended to apply the funds which will be donated in this case. Of course I have no objection. But, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that with the law upon the statute books providing for the incorporation of any sort of organization like this in the District of Columbia, we have not the power, in my humble opinion, to pass any such law as this. So, Mr. Speaker, while I voiced my convictions, I am aware that they are in a great measure old-fashioned. I am aware that we live in an age when, if it is urged that something be done because it is commendable, because it may aid humanity, because it may uplift somebody or something, we are asked to forget that we live in a Republic which is governed by a Constitution whose powers limit the authority and power of Congress. It is for this reason mainly that I shall not support the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does any other gentleman desire to speak?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against this bill, but I do not concur in the reasoning of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]. It seems to me that the insertion of the words "of the District of Columbia," in lines 8 and 9, cures the technical objection made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]. The reason why I shall vote against the bill is because I do not believe that special acts of incorporation should pass. I do not think this act creates the Rockefeller Foundation as a Federal incorporation. Upon the contrary, it makes it a corporation of the District of Columbia. That is its situs. It becomes a "citizen" of the District of Columbia, and it does not become a Federal incorporation. If it did become a Federal incorporation, I should agree with the reasoning of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] that the Congress would have no power to create it, because I think it is true that the Congress can not create a Federal corporation except where that corporation is to be an agent of the Government and to perform some governmental function. But undoubtedly the Congress does have the power to provide for the creation of corporations in the District of Columbia that shall be citizens of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARTLETT. True.

Mr. GARRETT. It may provide for that in a general act, just as a State legislature may pass a general act of incorporation; or it may provide for it by special act, just as a State legislature may provide, unless it be prevented by the State constitution.

Therefore it does not seem to me that the legal objection suggested by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] is tenable or sound. But, Mr. Speaker, the policy that is involved in the passage of these special acts is, it seems to me, very objectionable. It seems to me that the Committee on the District of Columbia or the Committee on the Judiciary ought at some time to work out and bring in some general plan here whereby eleemosynary institutions may be incorporated under the general law, and let us have a cessation of this running to Congress for special acts to incorporate eleemosynary and charitable institutions.

The purposes of this act may be very good. There have been very many apparently good acts brought before the Congress since I have been here, incorporating certain companies as corporations of the District of Columbia. There is no reason why there should not be a general act worked out. There is no general act now. These incorporators who are named in this act are not residents of the District of Columbia. The general act for incorporation in the District of Columbia requires that at least three of those incorporating here, according to my recollection——

Mr. BARTLETT. A majority of them.

Mr. GARRETT. Perhaps a majority of them, shall be residents of the District of Columbia. Of course, that is easy on a business proposition; but it seldom happens that eleemosynary institutions such as this have a majority of the incorporators residents of the District. But it seems to me that it would be the part of wisdom for the Committee on the Judiciary, which reported this bill, I believe, or the District Committee, or some other committee having jurisdiction of the subject matter, to work out some general plan that would take care of such institutions as this, and lodges, and societies for archeological research, and all the various institutions that have been or have sought to be incorporated here by special act, in order to prevent the necessity of men having to come to the Congress and go through this long, tedious course, and subject us to a policy which is probably unwise of granting charters of incorporation by special acts of Congress.

[Mr. FOWLER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD].

[Mr. SHACKLEFORD addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I ask unanimous consent to have five minutes, that I may reply to some of the arguments that have been advanced against the proposition.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that I have five minutes in which to reply to the gentleman from Virginia, I shall not object.

Mr. SAUNDERS. But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has done all of the "argumentation," so to speak, against the proposition.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia object to the limitation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended so that each side may have five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time upon each side be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Who is to have the five minutes in opposition to the proposition?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will control the time.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I want five minutes in which to reply.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know, but somebody else may be opposed to this.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. But not as heroically as I.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I object unless I may have five minutes in which to reply.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman from Missouri has objected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PETERS and Mr. COX of Indiana) there were—ayes 40, noes 25.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 7, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

That any order which modifies or sets aside the verdict or finding of a jury may be made the subject of judicial review in the same way and by like process as a final order in the cause, this section being intended to authorize a review of the exercise of discretion by the trial judge whenever such discretion is exercised upon a matter which it was the province of the jury to consider and determine.

CORCORAN BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., December 23, 1912.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN, Senate Chamber.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This letter is handed to you with two inclosures, to each of which I wish specially to ask your attention.

One of the inclosures is a copy of a petition which, in behalf of Walter Murphy, I submitted to-day to the Supreme Court of the United States. This petition is self-explanatory. It tells the story of how Walter Murphy has fared in the courts of the District of Columbia in a suit which he brought against the Capital Traction Co. for injuries resulting from an accident that happened to him in connection with one of the cars of that company while he was handling packages of newspapers that were to be transported from the Union Station to news stands in different parts of the city.

In the trial court the judge directed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the Capital Traction Co. The plaintiff appealed from the judgment that was entered against him upon the verdict so rendered, but he was denied a bill of exceptions, and a bill of exceptions in a case at law, as distinguished from a case in equity, is the only means by which to put the rulings of the trial judge upon record in the case; and, unless his exceptions, taken at the trial, were put into the record, the plaintiff's appeal was worthless. The denial to him of a bill of the exceptions which he had taken at the trial was so inappropriate to the facts of his case, so uncalled for by any just principle of law that governs the settlement of bills of exception, and the outcome of his trial and appeal, as approved by the Court of Appeals of the District, is so clearly violative of a sense of right and justice that I offer the case (described in this petition to the Supreme Court of the United States) as a sample of work by the judiciary, the like of which, by making the courts a means of defeating the hearing and determination of causes on their merits in the way that justice requires, has contributed in no small degree to the widespread popular discontent that is beginning to voice itself in a demand for the "recall" of judges and of judicial decisions.

Of course I am hopeful that the Supreme Court of the United States will grant the prayer of the petition and require the case to be certified up for review; but there is no legal duty resting on that court to review the case. The Supreme Court can not undertake to correct all the wrongs that are done in the courts of the United States. Indeed, it was to relieve the Supreme Court and lessen the number of cases to get upon its docket that Congress passed the act entitled "An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. L., 826–830), by which act a circuit court of appeals is created in each of the judicial circuits of the United States, and certain classes of cases defined in which the judgments of the circuit courts of appeals are declared to be final, except that of such cases it is made competent for the Supreme Court in any case to require the case to be certified up to itself for review and determination. And the recent "judicial code," entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911 (36 Stat. L., Pt. I, pp. 1087–1169), puts the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia upon a parity with the circuit courts of appeals so far as the reviewing of its decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States is concerned, section 251 of that act being as follows (p. 1159, ditto):

"In any case in which the judgment or decree of said Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia is made final by the section last preceding, it shall be competent for the Supreme Court of the United States to require, by certiorari or otherwise, any such case to be certified to it for its review and determination, with the same power and authority in the case as if it had been carried by writ of error or appeal to said Supreme Court."

As may be seen from the statutes above cited, the Supreme Court of the United States may, of its own pleasure, on proper petition, order up for review a case which otherwise could not get into that tribunal; but the court is not easily persuaded to reach out in that way for new business, and thereby add to the burdens of its docket, already filled with cases which under the law are entitled to go upon its docket in regular course by appeal or writ of error, namely, cases, speaking generally, which involve the construction or application of the Constitution of the United States or the validity or construction of a statute or treaty of the United States. Twenty-eight petitions praying for writs of certiorari have been presented during the present term of the court, excluding to-day, from different parts of the country, including the District of Columbia, and of this number 27 have been denied and 1 granted; 4 were presented to-day.

If this petition of Walter Murphy should be denied by the Supreme Court of the United States, that will be the end of poor Walter Murphy and his case; but I wanted it to appear that the last word which it was possible for counsel to say in the courts had been said in his behalf. I wanted the case to be thus singled out and embalmed, to stand as a memorial of what it is possible for judges, using the machinery of the courts, to do with the most valued and sacred of personal rights when such rights are taken into the courts for adjudication.

Now, permit me a few words more concerning some of the work done in the courts of the District of Columbia, under the appellate authority and supervision of the Court of Appeals of the District, and I will be ready to speak specially of the second inclosure which this letter contains.

On the same day that the court of appeals announced its decision in the case of Walter Murphy it announced its decision in another negligence case, in which there had been a directed verdict in the trial court, namely, the case of Ross against the Washington Railway & Electric Co.

In the summer of 1909 the Washington Railway & Electric Co. had the streets torn up, relaying its tracks and roadbed from Fifth and F Streets NW. to P Street and Dupont Circle. The tracks from Fifth Street run along F Street to Fourteenth; then up Fourteenth to H; then along H from Fourteenth to Seventeenth, where they turn north until they enter Connecticut Avenue, which they follow to P and Dupont Circle. For weeks H Street was in a torn-up condition in the neighborhood of Vermont Avenue, where Miss Janet Ross daily crossed H Street on her way to and from the War Department, in which she was employed. Sometimes she crossed on a driveway placed for teams. On the day in question, there being no footway for pedestrians and no driveway for teams, and nothing in the way of a crossing appearing in sight as far as the eye could reach—east to Fourteenth Street and west to Seventeenth Street—she did as many other persons were doing at the time—it being about 4.35 p. m., immediately after the daily discharge of the hundreds of employees of the State, War, Navy, and Treasury Departments—namely, she started to cross the street, picking her way as carefully as she could. Suddenly, as she was in the act of stepping for the last rail in her passage across, she slipped and fell, seriously injuring herself in the fall.

It is the duty of the street car company, under the statutory terms of its charter, to keep the part of the street occupied by its tracks, including on each side of its tracks a space of 2 feet beyond the outer rail of the tracks, well paved and in good order; and it is also the duty of the street car company, when repairing its roadbed and tracks, so to conduct its work that the usefulness of the highway for the general public will be impaired in as small a degree as possible. At the time Miss Ross was hurt breaches of this duty were in evidence as far as the eye could reach, both to the east and to the west—no footways or temporary crossings in sight for either men or horses. In the midst of this negligence on the part of the street car company the lady, using such care as was possible in the crossing of the street under such circumstances, suddenly, so quickly that she was not aware of what particular feature or item of the situation caused it, finds that she has fallen and sustained bruises and strains and injuries such as could not have happened if the street had been in fit condition for use or provided with proper facilities for passage. Now, think of it. A jury under such circumstances is not to be trusted to pass upon the negligence or the lack of it in either plaintiff or defendant and to say whether it was the defendant's negligence that was responsible for the accident that befell the plaintiff. The trial judge, in directing a verdict for the street car company, himself drew the conclusion and acted upon it that the plaintiff was herself guilty of contributory negligence in undertaking to cross the street in the condition it was in, but the court of appeals, in affirming the judgment of the trial court, rests its decision upon the ground that the work of the street car company was under the supervision and subject to the control of the Commissioners of the District, and that it did not appear that the commissioners had ordered or directed anything to be done which the company had failed to do, and that the company was not therefore to be charged with negligence in the manner of doing its work.

Think of such an announcement of law given out to sustain a directed verdict in a negligence case. As well say that a street car company, where the speed limit in force is 8 miles an hour, can run a car along the street at a place where the street is congested with traffic at the rate, say, of 6 miles an hour, and, if sued by some one who has sustained damage by reason of the speed at which the car was going, plead in justification that the car was going only at the rate of 6 miles an hour, whereas under the municipal regulation it had the right to go as fast as 8 miles an hour, as if even 3 miles an hour at some times and places and under some circumstances might not be negligence of the grossest kind, the truth being that negligence, or what is the same thing—the lack of ordinary care befitting the circumstances—is essentially a fact determinable by the jury in the light of the facts and circumstances of the particular situation.

True, the Ross case might have been laid before the Supreme Court of the United States and a certiorari prayed for, but to what effect? Could it be reasonably expected of the Supreme Court that it would order the Ross case up for review? The utmost that could be done in the Ross case would be, in phrasing a petition to the Supreme Court, to keep in mind the frequency with which directed verdicts are ordered and approved in this jurisdiction, and, treating the Ross case only as a symptom of the trouble that needs attention, pray the court, since all such cases can not be ordered up for review, to make use of the Ross case and render a decision therein that shall thereafter be helpful to the lower courts. But to this course—overlooking for the moment the lady herself, who by this time might, like a great many others, be too much discouraged with the courts to go further in her efforts—there was a two-fold objection: First, if the case were ordered up and reviewed by the Supreme Court and the lower court reversed, there is no guaranty, judging the future by the past, that there would be any permanent or lasting good effects, as I will illustrate in a moment; second, the petition, if made, would in all probability be denied, and I did not propose—the client eliminated from consideration in the matter—that those who shall undertake to oppose what I shall suggest as a needed remedy, should have it in their power to say that the Supreme Court, by refusing on such a petition to review the case, had thereby given its tacit approval to the doings of the lower court. I did not want anybody to have opportunity thus to misinterpret the meaning of its action, if such action should be taken by the Supreme Court. Further, what constitutes negligence is so peculiar to each case, negligence being something which the facts and circumstances of the particular case must determine, that a decision in one case will not necessarily afford the criteria for deciding another case. And hence, if a judge has reached the point that he thinks it to be his duty himself to consider the force and effect of evidence, and himself to draw the deductions which, to his mind, all reasonable men must draw from the evidence, a reversal of him in one negligence case will not very seriously influence or affect him in another.

Let me illustrate this matter of directed verdicts with another case or two that may be seen in the reports. Take the case of Mosheuvel v. District of Columbia, reported in 17 App. D. C., 401, and in 191 U. S., 247. In this case, a hole resulting from an uncovered water box in the sidewalk was at the foot of three steps which led to the sidewalk from a brick-paved landing at the front of the house in which Mrs. Mosheuvel lived. The box was about 4 inches square, projecting irregularly above the level of the street, and was without covering of any kind. Its condition was well known both to Mrs. Mosheuvel, the plaintiff, and to the District authorities. It was situated about the middle of the steps from her house, and in going from the house it was necessary to go either to the right or to the left of the box, which it would be perfectly safe to do, or to step over the box and clear it. The plaintiff testified that, on the day in question, from the time she left her door, she had the box in view a part of the time, and had it in mind all the time, and remembered its dangerous character, but that, on this occasion, she attempted to step over it instead of going to one side; that she did not take a sufficiently long step, and her foot went into the hole, and she was thrown, with the result that she suffered serious injury.

In the trial court the judge directed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant, and the Court of Appeals of the District, in affirming the judgment which had been entered on the verdict so directed, makes use of the following language (p. 406, ditto):

"Despite the fact that the negligence of the District has been great and is almost confessed on the record, we can find no difference in principle between this case and that of Brewer v. District of Columbia (7 App. D. C., 113) upon the authority of which the court below proceeded.

"In pursuance of the decision in the Brewer case, we must affirm, with costs, the judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in the premises."

The case, on a writ of error, was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that court in reversing the lower court concludes its opinion in these words (p. 266, ditto):

"Was the situation of the water box and the hazard to result from an attempt to step over it so great that the plaintiff, with the knowledge of the situation, could not, as a reasonably prudent person, have elected to step across the box instead of stepping to the sidewalk from either side of the tread of the last step? And this, we think, was, under the undisputed proof, a question for the jury and not for the court."

The jolt administered by the Supreme Court of the United States in the reversal of the above judgment was shortly followed by another jolt in the case of Chunn v. The City & Suburban Railway, reported in 23 Appeals District of Columbia, 551, and in 207 United States, 302. It was a writ of error also which took this case to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The plaintiff in this case was a young woman, who for a year or more before the accident which befell her had lived and worked at Riverdale, in Maryland, coming into Washington now and then on the cars of the City & Suburban Railway. The platform from which persons traveling from Riverdale to Washington boarded the cars, consisted of boards laid on the ground, with sleepers under them, and extended 30 feet lengthwise along the tracks. This platform covered the space between the tracks, also the space between the rails of the tracks, and extended the width of two boards outside the outer tracks. The distance between the inner rails of the two tracks was 7 feet and 10 inches. The steps of the cars projected 2 feet and 2 inches beyond the tracks, leaving, when two cars passed each other at that point, a clear space between them of 3 feet and 6 inches. One standing on the platform at that point could see or be seen for a distance of at least a quarter of a mile north or south along the tracks.

As the car for Washington approached from the north, the young woman who wished to board it went to the platform and stood between the tracks. There were other persons intending to take the car, one of whom was near her and also between the tracks. As the car for Washington came from the north, another of defendant's cars came from the south. The Washington car slowed down and came to a stop just as the latter car, without stopping, ran by "at a rapid rate of speed"; one witness said "12 to 15 miles an hour." No one saw exactly what happened to the plaintiff, who was standing near the north end of the platform, but the sound of "a shock" was heard, and the plaintiff was found unconscious between the tracks 10 or 15 feet north of the north end of the platform.

At the trial of the case in court the other person, who was standing between the tracks, testified, "There was ample room to stand if you were thinking what you were doing"; "I realized that I would have to hold myself strictly in the center of the two tracks."

The judge in the trial court directed the jury to render a verdict in favor of the railway company, and the Court of Appeals of the District, in affirming the judgment entered on that verdict, uses the following language (23 App. D. C., 564):

"Carefully considering the evidence in the light of all reasonable inferences that can be drawn from its undisputed facts, our conclusion is that the plaintiff's injuries were the result of her own want of ordinary care. * * * Plaintiff had no recollection of what she was doing or where she was standing at the time. It does not appear that she was deficient in intellect, and she ought to have seen the car and exercised her thought, as did her witness. * * * Being of the opinion that the trial court was right in directing the verdict upon the ground of the plaintiff's contributory negligence, the judgment will be affirmed with costs."

Look at the above language again and see with what assurance the judges undertook to perform the function of the jury, going so far as to say of the plaintiff, "It does not appear that she was deficient in intellect, and she ought to have seen the car and exercised her thought."

Read now what the Supreme Court of the United States had to say concerning the above judgment of the court of appeals, pronounced on an issue which was properly determinable by the jury in the trial court (207 U. S., 307):

"A jury might well say that under such circumstances reasonable care demanded—of the defendant company—the exercise of the utmost vigilance, foresight, and precaution. The motorman of the northbound car could see plainly that the car for Washington was about to stop and that passengers were standing upon the space between the tracks intending to enter it. He might readily have understood that the noise of the transit of the two cars would be commingled, and that those who intended to enter the other car would naturally direct their attention to it, and might fail to notice the approach of his own car. In point of fact, the motorman took no precaution whatever; he assumed that those who were standing on the platform would take care of themselves, and ran his car by them at full speed, as if oblivious of their existence. * * * Nor was the plaintiff necessarily wanting in due care by taking her place between the tracks. It was the usual place from which entrance to the Washington car was made. It was safe enough under ordinary circumstances. It was made unsafe only by reason of the defendant's negligent act in running another car rapidly by. The plaintiff had the right to assume that the defendant would not commit such an act of negligence, and that when it stopped one car and thereby invited her to enter it, it would not run another rapidly by the place of her entrance and put her in peril. We think that it can not be said, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. That issue with the others in the case should have been submitted to the jury with appropriate instructions. * * *

"The judgment is reversed and the case remanded to the court of appeals, with directions to reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and remand the cause to that court with a direction to set aside the verdict and award a new trial."

While on the subject of directed verdicts, let me illustrate the matter further with a case or two which did not arise in the District of Columbia, for the evil to which I am now calling attention is not confined to the District of Columbia, the action of inferior judges of the courts of the United States, more than all other causes combined, being what primarily and chiefly is responsible for the demand, now heard in all parts of the country, that the judicial system be reformed. The case of Kane v. Northern Central Ry. Co. (128 U. S., 91) came before the Supreme Court of the United States on a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pensylvania.

In that case a missing step had caused a brakeman in clambering down between two cars of a freight train to fall and lose both legs. In his suit against the railroad company it appeared from the brakeman's own testimony that he knew that the step was missing, having called the attention of the conductor to the fact only a few hours before, and that, had he thought of the missing step at the moment he sought to use it, he might have pulled himself back with his hands or have "slid down" on the brake rod, for he had before climbed up and down by holding that rod with one hand and putting his foot against it and pulling himself up until he touched the running board. The trial judge at once saw contributory negligence, and directed a verdict for the defendant. Says the Supreme Court (p. 96):

"We are of the opinion that the court erred in not submitting to the jury to determine whether the plaintiff, in forgetting or not recalling at the precise moment the fact that the car from which he attempted to let himself down was the one from which a step was missing, was in the exercise of the degree of care and caution which was incumbent upon a man of ordinary prudence in the same calling and under the circumstances in which he was placed."

Likewise in Jones v. East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railroad Co. (128 U. S., 443), in error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Tennessee, the trial court, in directing a verdict for the defendant expressed itself as follows (p. 444):

"In the judgment of this court, based upon the facts shown in evidence and not controverted by the argument, touching the manner of plaintiff's collision with defendant's engine, the plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence as precludes him from all right to recover in this action. The court therefore instructs you to return a verdict for the defendant."

Says the Supreme Court (p. 446):

"Instead of the course here pursued a due regard for the respective functions of the court and the jury would seem to demand that these questions should have been submitted to the jury, accompanied by such instructions from the presiding judge as would have secured a sound verdict."

True, the Supreme Court of the United States has said that, where the facts are such that all reasonable men must draw from them the same conclusion, the question of negligence may properly be regarded as one of law for the court; it has also said that, if the evidence is such that the court would not permit a contrary verdict to stand if rendered, the court may itself direct the verdict without submitting the matter to the jury. But such words are to be read and understood in the light of the circumstances under which uttered and not given too broad or general an application. Once let a judge or a court, feeding on words such as may be found here and there in opinions of the courts of last resort, become imbued with the notion that it is the function of judges to consider what the inference or deduction is that all reasonable men must draw from the facts appearing in evidence, and you will soon have judicial exemplifications of the old Bible proverb, "Seest thou a man wise in his own conceit? There is more hope of a fool than of him."

Because I speak plainly on this subject, do not suppose for one moment that I am among those who advocate a popular recall as the necessary remedy to correct conditions which, in the courts, need correction, and which, in the end, most certainly will be corrected. It is because I want to see the remedy found (as it can be) without resort to so radical an innovation on the branch, which, of all others of our representative government, ought to be preserved from the turmoil of the hustings, that I am speaking as I am. Of course, every branch of our Government, the judiciary as well as the executive and the legislative, must find the highest law eventually in the will of the people which is back of the Constitution and which is competent to make constitutions and to amend them. But let us not put into the dust and contests of the arena questions which ought to be determined within the precincts of a temple dedicated to justice where the judges of the law and the triers of the fact can meet together as integral parts of the tribunal to whose findings and judgment are committed the dearest rights of the citizen.

However, our present system, it may be remarked in passing, is not limited, as concerns the recalling of judges, to the one method of an impeachment proceeding such as the House of Representatives, as to one judge, is now pursuing before the Senate of the United States. During the Civil War the whole of the District of Columbia judiciary, good as well as bad, was removed from office at one time. In the case I refer to, it was not an abolishment of a court and a saving of the judges, as in the case of the recent Court of Commerce, but the saving of the court, under another name, and the turning out of the judges. I will show you the matter by references.

The original organic act entitled, "An act concerning the District of Columbia," approved February 27, 1801 (2 Stat. L., 103), had provided in section 3:

"That there shall be a court in said District, which shall be called the circuit court of the District of Columbia; and the said court and the judges thereof shall have all the powers by law vested in the circuit courts and the judges of the circuit courts of the United States. Said court shall consist of one chief judge and two assistant judges, resident within said District, to hold their respective offices during good behavior."

The act entitled, "An act to amend the judicial system of the United States," approved April 29, 1802 (2 Stat. L., 156), had provided in section 24:

"That the chief judge of the District of Columbia shall hold a district court of the United States, in and for the said District, on the first Tuesday of April and on the first Tuesday of October in every year; which court shall have and exercise, within the said District, the same powers and jurisdiction which are by law vested in the district courts of the United States."

And the act entitled, "An act to establish a criminal court in the District of Columbia," approved July 7, 1838 (5 Stat. L., 306), transferred all criminal business pending in the circuit court to the criminal court then created and provided:

"The said criminal court shall have all the jurisdiction in the said counties, respectively (the county of Washington and the county of Alexandria, which then constituted the District of Columbia), now held by the said circuit court in the said counties, respectively, for the trial and punishment of all crimes and offenses, and the recovery of all fines, forfeitures, and recognizances."

Section 5 of the above act gave the circuit court authority to review, by writ of error, the judgments of the criminal court.

And then came the act entitled, "An act to reorganize the courts in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. L., 762), in section 1 of which act it was provided:

"That there shall be established in the District a court to be called the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, which shall have general jurisdiction in law and equity. It shall consist of four justices, one of whom shall be denominated as chief justice."

And in section 16 of that act it was provided:

"That the Circuit Court, District Court, and Criminal Court of the District of Columbia are hereby abolished. All laws and parts of laws relating to said courts, so far as the same are applicable to the courts created by this act, are hereby continued in force in respect to such courts, and all other laws and parts of laws relating to said circuit, district, and criminal courts are repealed."

The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, created with four judges, as above mentioned, is the present Supreme Court of the District, the judges having since been increased to six. The appellate jurisdiction, which, on its organization, was vested in the general term of the Supreme Court of the District, where the judges sat in banc (two or more), as distinguished from the special terms, where the individual judges sat to hear and try cases, was taken away by the act entitled "An act to establish a Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved February 9, 1893 (27 Stat. L., 434), this latter act being the one which called into existence the present Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

To recur to the matter of directed verdicts in negligence cases—a right of appeal, as already illustrated, does not afford of itself a sufficient remedy. Many parties against whom directed verdicts are rendered become disheartened at once, and many are wholly unable to pay the costs of even at first appeal, much less of a further appeal, such as was formerly permitted to the Supreme Court of the United States. As long as judges, whether the bench they sit on is in a trial court or in an appellate court, are allowed to make deductions and draw conclusions concerning issues whose determination is properly for the men who constitute the jury the evil will be present, and unless severely checked a constantly growing one, for the judges always declare their own deductions and conclusions to be what the law itself says concerning the facts in evidence; and every time an appellate court, in affirming a directed verdict, adds something to the already existing declarations of what is to be regarded as negligence in the view of the law—that is, in the view of the judges themselves—that much additional ground is taken from the jury and added to the domain of judge-made law, which law is itself made to do duty in future adjudications; and so the evil grows. I wish to suggest that the encroachment of judges upon the domain of the jury ought to be stopped by positive law. And this brings me to the second inclosure contained in this communication.

This second inclosure, as you will observe, is the draft of a bill to limit judges to declaring the law when charging juries. If such a bill as is here suggested were enacted into law, a judge who wished to decide the issue himself, thinking the plaintiff had not made out a case, would find that, instead of directing a verdict for the defendant, he must order a nonsuit of the plaintiff. And the act of the trial judge, viewed from the standpoint of a nonsuit, would appear in a very different light than when viewed from the standpoint of a directed verdict. Too often in the case of a directed verdict the question considered by the appellate court is, Did the trial judge draw the correct conclusion from the evidence? Whether he did or did not is the question which properly was answerable by the jury. In the case of a nonsuit, the question to be considered by the appellate court would be, Was there any evidence in the case for the consideration of the jury? If there was, the case should have gone to the jury, for it is immaterial, if there was evidence for the jury, whether the conclusion of the judge upon the evidence was correct or incorrect.

The inclosed draft provides also, as you will observe, that orders which modify or set aside the verdicts of juries may be reviewed. This provision is intended to meet the case where a judge, finding himself unable to direct a verdict, may submit the case to the jury, and then, if the verdict turned in by the jury does not suit him, set it aside. At present, the power of the trial judge in civil cases to set verdicts aside is absolute, and such power, no matter how arbitrarily or capriciously used, is not subject to review or control. And the practice has become quite common for the judge, if he personally thinks that a verdict is too large, to order it set aside as excessive, unless the plaintiff will remit the amount which the judge shall say is excessive.

The provision of the inclosed draft on this point would not prevent judges from dealing with verdicts in such manner as may be proper; it simply makes the discretion of the trial judge a subject of judicial review when exercised upon work done by the jury.

No good reason exists why a bill of the kind here suggested should not be enacted into law. It would be the means of removing from trial judges all invitations, which motions to direct verdicts extend to them, to trespass upon the ground of the jury. It would also be the means of freeing the courts, in part at least, from the notion, which is fast taking hold of the popular mind, that judges of the lower courts of the United States, who are allowed to hold their office for life, arrogate to themselves too much authority in passing upon and disposing of the rights of the individual citizen.

Let me say, in conclusion, that in our common-law system of jurisprudence the jury is as much an integral part of the court as the judge on the bench, the two together constituting the tribunal whose function it is to pass upon and settle all issues raised by litigants, whether of law or of fact. The system does not contemplate that the judge on the bench shall make of himself a thirteenth juror, to displace with his own judgment the 12 other men to whose concurring judgment the law commits the finding upon all issues of fact. It is the province of the judge to say what shall and what shall not be admitted as evidence in the cause, but the credibility of the evidence, the weight to be given to it, the inferences and deductions to be drawn from it as affecting the issue of fact to be determined, are matters within the province of the jury. And that the functions of the jury may not be minimized, even though the facts in evidence may be undisputed, let me quote the following passage from the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in Railroad Co. v. Stout (17 Wall., 657, 664):

"Twelve men of the average of the community, comprising men of education and men of little education, men of learning and men whose learning consists only in what they have themselves seen and heard—the merchant, the mechanic, the farmer, the laborer—these sit together, consult, apply their separate experience of the affairs of life to the facts proven, and draw a unanimous conclusion. This average judgment thus given it is the great effort of the law to obtain. It is assumed that 12 men know more of the common affairs of life than does 1 man; that they can draw wiser and safer conclusions from admitted facts thus occurring than can a single judge."

If judges who sit in trial courts would only ponder more carefully the utterances above quoted concerning the functions of the jury, there would be fewer attempts to direct verdicts.

I am, yours, very truly,

JOHN ALTHEUS JOHNSON.

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

(October term, 1912.)

Walter Murphy, petitioner, v. Ashley M. Gould, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, respondent.

MOTION THAT LEAVE BE GRANTED TO WALTER MURPHY TO PRESENT PETITION PRAYING FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE COURT OF APPEALS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Comes now into this honorable court Mr. John Altheus Johnson, admitted by this honorable court as an attorney and counsellor at law. And he moves that leave be granted to Walter Murphy to present to this honorable court a petition praying for a writ of certiorari to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

And the counsellor aforesaid submits with his motion a copy of the said petition.

JOHN ALTHEUS JOHNSON.

Please take notice that the above is the tenor of a motion which, on Monday, the 23d day of December, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon, or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard, I shall submit to the Supreme Court of the United States.

I hand you herewith a copy of the petition referred to in the said motion.

JOHN ALTHEUS JOHNSON.

DECEMBER 4, 1912.

To Mr. FREDERIC D. MCKENNEY,
Attorney for the Hon. Ashley M. Gould, and
To Mr. R. ROSS PERRY,
Attorney for the Capital Traction Co.

Copy received December 4, 1912.

R. ROSS PERRY.

Petition of Walter Murphy, a citizen of the United States, 26 years of age, born in the District of Columbia and resident therein.

To the honorable the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States:

Humbly presenting myself before your honors, with this, my petition, I crave leave to state:

1. "Not to me returns
Day, or the sweet approach of ev'n or morn,
Or sight of vernal bloom, or summer's rose,
Or flocks, or herds, or human face divine;
But cloud instead, and ever-during dark
Surrounds me, from the cheerful ways of men
Cut off."

2. My blindness is the result of negligence by the Capital Traction Co. in the manipulation of one of its street cars near the Union Station, in the city of Washington, on December 2, 1909.

3. A suit in damages which I had brought on February 25, 1910, in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia against the Capital Traction Co. for the injury I had received as the result of its negligent act came to trial in June, 1912, before Associate Justice Ashley M. Gould, of that court, and a jury, and ended on the 19th day of that month in a verdict, which the jury, by direction of the court, rendered in favor of the said Capital Traction Co. On July 2, 1912, judgment was entered on the said verdict in favor of the said company.

4. During the progress of the trial several rulings were made by the justice aforesaid upon questions of law arising upon the trial, to which rulings the counsel by whom I was represented at the time they were made and before the jury had retired took exceptions, and the exceptions thus taken, I am informed and believe, were duly noted on the minutes of the presiding justice aforesaid.

5. On July 19, 1912, through counsel I prayed in open court an appeal to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia from the judgment aforesaid of July 2, and the said appeal was duly perfected on July 26, 1912.

6. A rule of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia says that the bill of exceptions, if not settled before the jury retires, "shall be submitted to the court within 38 days after judgment shall have been entered unless the court shall, for cause shown, extend the time."

The summer vacation period of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, as arranged by the justices of the said court, has consisted for several years past of the three months of July, August, and September, during which period each of the six justices performs a service upon the bench of two weeks, each justice knowing by prearrangement in the early part of the summer the portion of time he is to occupy the bench during the summer recess, and at such time he attends to business, so far as it is competent or proper for him to act thereon, in all the branches of the court. During the summer vacation of 1912 the bench, from Friday, August 16, to Friday, August 30, was occupied by Justice Ashley M. Gould, and from Monday, September 16, to and including Monday, September 30, by Chief Justice Harry M. Clabaugh.

On August 19, 1912, it being still the same term of the court at which the trial was had of my aforesaid suit against the Capital Traction Co., the said Supreme Court of the District entered an order in the cause in the words following, to wit:

"For good cause shown the time within which to submit to the court the bill of exceptions taken at the trial of this cause is hereby extended to and including the 20th day of September, 1912."

On September 19, 1912, one of the counsel by whom I was represented in the case, "rising in open court" (I quote from what is of record in the case in court, a copy of which record, to be hereinafter referred to, is attached to this petition), "with the bill of exceptions in his hand, stated to the court (Mr. Chief Justice Clabaugh sitting) that he had a bill of exceptions in a case which had been tried before Mr. Justice Gould, who would be the proper one to settle and sign it; that the matter would have to await the return of Justice Gould, but that the time to submit the bill would, under an order of the court, expire the next day; that counsel desired the record to show that the bill was then submitted, and that proper notice would be given to counsel on the other side of the time for settling it. The chief justice thereupon stated, as a direction to the clerk, 'Bill of exceptions submitted,' and counsel for the plaintiff then, in open court, handed the bill of exceptions to the clerk, who had received the order of the court in the premises." And the minute entry of the said submission, as made in the cause aforesaid, is in the words following, to wit:

"Comes now the plaintiff, by his attorneys of record, and submits to the court the bill of exceptions taken at the trial of this cause."

As the rule of the said supreme court contemplates that a bill of exceptions shall not be settled except upon notice to opposing counsel, that notice to be given for a time that shall be at least eight days after a copy of the bill shall have been presented to such counsel, I thereafter, to wit, on September 26, 1912, through my counsel, gave to counsel for the Capital Traction Co. a notice in writing of the time at which Justice Gould would be asked to settle and sign the said bill, that notice being in the words following, to wit:

"Take notice, that on Tuesday, October 1, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m., or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard, counsel for the plaintiff will ask Mr. Justice Gould to settle and sign the bill of exceptions which was submitted to the court in the above-entitled cause on September 19, 1912, a copy of which bill was presented to you on September 18, 1912."

October 1, the day designated in the said notice (and the earliest day, by reason of his absence from the city, at which Justice Gould, the only person who could settle and sign the bill, would be available), was the beginning of another term of the court, September 30 being the end of the April term, which was the trial term of the cause aforesaid, the first Tuesday in October, which in 1912 fell on the 1st day of the month, being the beginning of the next succeeding term, which is the October term of the court.

On September 26, 1912, the same day the aforesaid notice was given of the time at which it was proposed that the bill of exceptions should be settled, I filed through counsel a motion in the cause asking for a two-day extension of the April or trial term of the court, counsel explaining that the purpose of the motion was to enable the bill of exceptions, at the same term of the court at which the exceptions were taken, to be put actually, for settlement and signature, into the hands of the very judge who must settle and sign; and when this motion was considered and acted upon by the court it was ordered:

"That an extension be, and the same hereby is, made of the said April term of the circuit court, so as to cause the said term to extend to and include the 2d day of October, 1912."

On October 1, 1912, in accordance with the terms of the notice aforesaid, I presented, through counsel, my bill of exceptions to Justice Ashley M. Gould, with the request that he settle and sign the same.

7. On September 23, 1912, counsel for the Capital Traction Co. had filed a motion in the said Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to strike out the bill of exceptions, which I had tendered as aforesaid, on the ground (a) "that two days' notice in writing to counsel for the defendant of the time at which it was proposed to submit the said bill of exceptions to the court to be settled, as required by common-law rule No. 48 of this court, was not given to the said counsel for the defendant nor to any of them, nor was any other notice given in accordance with the said rule of court; and (b) that neither the said proposed bill nor a copy thereof was presented to counsel for the defendant nor to any of them at least eight days before the said 19th day of September, 1912, nor was the proposed bill or a copy thereof presented at any time to counsel for the defendant or to any of them prior to the 18th day of September, 1912."

Common-law rule 48 of the rules of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, thus referred to, reads as follows:

"1. The bill of exceptions shall be prepared by counsel. If not settled before the jury retires, counsel tendering it shall give two days' notice in writing to opposing counsel of the time at which it is proposed to submit the same to the court to be settled, and shall also at least eight days before the time designated in such notice present to opposing counsel the proposed bill or a copy thereof. The bill shall be submitted to the court within 38 days after judgment shall have been entered, unless the court shall, for cause shown, extend the time.

"2. The fact of the settling and filing of the bill of exceptions shall be noted in the minutes of the court.

"3. If the court is unable to settle the bill of exceptions, a new trial shall be granted.

"4. The submission, settling, signing, or filing of a bill of exceptions shall not be affected by the expiration of any term, provided this rule is complied with.

"5. This rule shall apply to pending cases."

The motion to strike out, made as above stated, was, on September 30, 1912, by the chief justice then holding the several branches of the Supreme Court of the District, set for hearing on October 11, 1912.

On October 1, 1912, Justice Ashley M. Gould, to whom on that day my said bill of exceptions, as hereinbefore stated, was tendered to be settled and signed under the submission of it which had been made to the court on September 19, 1912, and of the notice to opposing counsel of September 26, as hereinbefore mentioned, received the same into his personal custody, but delayed action thereon until October 11, 1912, when the aforesaid motion to strike out came before him for consideration; and he thereupon, to wit, on October 16, 1912, refused to consider the said bill of exceptions and ordered the same to be stricken from the files of the court, on the sole ground "that neither the said proposed bill of exceptions, nor a copy thereof, was presented to counsel for the defendant at least eight days before the said bill of exceptions was submitted to the court," the order which the court passed in the premises being in the words following, to wit:

"It appearing to the court that the said bill of exceptions was not settled before the jury retired in the above-entitled cause, and that the time for submitting the same was extended by the court until and including the 20th day of September, 1912, and that the same was submitted by counsel for the plaintiff to the court on the 19th day of September, 1912, and that the notice thereof prescribed by common law rule No. 48 of this court was not given to counsel for the defendant herein, and that neither the said proposed bill of exceptions nor a copy thereof was presented to counsel for the defendant at least eight days before the said bill of exceptions was submitted as aforesaid: it is by the court, this 16th day of October, 1912, ordered that the said bill of exceptions be, and the same is hereby, stricken from the files of this court."

8. Upon the making by Justice Gould of the order aforesaid of October 16, 1912, I was advised by counsel that the appeal I had taken from the judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia of July 2, 1912, would be worthless, the record in the case not disclosing reversible error, unless the rulings of the said justice, made during the progress of the trial, to which through counsel I had duly excepted, could be put into the record by a proper bill of exceptions. Having, as I have stated, sought of him such a bill and been refused the same, I thought to invoke in that regard the aid of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia. I therefore, on October 22, 1912, presented a petition to the said court of appeals, wherein I prayed the said court to make use of the writ of mandamus and command the said Ashley M. Gould, as an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, to settle the bill of exceptions which I had tendered to him as aforesaid, according to the truth of the matters which took place before him on the trial of the cause at law, No. 52404, wherein your present petitioner, Walter Murphy, was plaintiff, and the Capital Traction Co., a corporation, was defendant, and, when so settled, to sign the same as of the 19th day of September, 1912, that being the day when the said bill of exceptions was submitted to the court, the case so described in the said petition to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, being the case to which I have hereinbefore had reference.

The mandamus proceedings wherein I thus sought the aid of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia are entitled, "The United States ex relatione Walter Murphy, petitioner, v. Ashley M. Gould, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, respondent," and the case is entered on the docket of the said court of appeals as No. 393, original.

9. The Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia having in the aforesaid mandamus proceedings issued a rule for Justice Gould to show cause why he should not be required to settle and sign the bill of exceptions submitted to him to be settled and signed as aforesaid, the said justice, in answer to said rule, made response that "the respondent, in addition to the grounds of action specified in respondent's said order of October 16, 1912, above referred to, was largely moved with respect to the making of said order by the fact" that more than 40 days, exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays, had elapsed between the perfecting of plaintiff's appeal and the submission of plaintiff's exceptions to the court and that no order had been made or passed in the cause extending the time for filing the transcript of record in the Court of Appeals of the District, and the respondent, under such a state of fact, concluded that "the settling of any bill of exceptions in said cause would be ineffective and vain."

In other words, the return of Justice Gould to the rule to show cause set up that his action in making the aforesaid order of October 16, 1912, was determined, not solely by rule 48 of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia (as had appeared to be the case, both from the terms of said order and from the terms of the motion upon which the said order was based), but also by the provision of a rule of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, which reads as follows (Rule 15, par. 1), to wit:

"When an appeal is entered in the court below it shall be the duty of the appellant, within 40 days from the time of the appeal entered and perfected in said court (unless such time for special and sufficient cause be extended by the court below, or a judge thereof, such time to be definite and fixed), to produce and file with the clerk of this court a transcript of the record of such cause; and, if he shall fail to file the transcript within the time limited therefor, the appellee may, after the time limited for filing the transcript in this court by the appellant has expired, and upon his or her default in respect thereto, upon producing a certificate showing the entry of appeal and the date thereof, have said appeal docketed and dismissed."

Respecting this rule of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, referred to by Justice Gould in his return as constituting a factor influencing him in his refusal to settle the bill of exceptions which I had tendered to him for settlement, I am advised by counsel that the record of the cause in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, so far as concerns the said rule of the court of appeals, is chiefly embarrassing to me in my appeal, because of an order in the case which Justice Gould himself, on the 16th day of October (an order duly excepted to, and the bill of exceptions ordered on record November 4, 1912), had made antecedently to the order of the same date, which, as hereinbefore mentioned, contained his refusal to settle the exceptions taken at the trial of the cause.

When the counsel by whom I was represented discovered, on September 18, 1912, that the minute entry of the hereinbefore mentioned order of August 19, 1912, which made an extension of time until September 20, 1912, was silent concerning the filing of the transcript of record in the court of appeals and only express concerning the submitting to the court of the bill of exceptions, they at once called the matter to the attention of counsel for the Capital Traction Co., with a view to having the minute entry corrected, the particular counsel on whose oral motion the order had been made being positive in his statements that the motion as made and allowed on the 19th day of August embraced the filing of the transcript in the court of appeals as well as the submission of the bill of exceptions in the lower court; and at the request of counsel representing me, who wished at the earliest moment possible to explain the situation to the court, counsel for the Capital Traction Co. came into court the next day and with my own counsel discussed to the court the two motions that day by me filed in court, one to correct the minute entry of August 19, the other to make an extension of time (further extension) within which to file the transcript of record in the court of appeals. The court did not make its formal order until the following day, September 20, 1912, when it set both the said motions for hearing on October 11, 1912, but the discussion on September 19 showed that the motion to correct would be opposed and that there would probably exist a difference of recollection as to the occurrence of August 19.

When the hearing of the application to correct the minute entry of the order of August 19, 1912, was thus set for a day within the following term of the court, I thought it the part of prudence, acting through and under the advice of counsel, while we were still within the same term of the court at which the order of August 19 had been made, to present, for alternative consideration with the application to correct, a motion for an amendment to be made, nunc pro tunc, to the order of August 19, to the end that, so far as the lower court was concerned, full opportunity should be given to it to exercise whatever of its discretion it might choose to use in the matter of aiding me to an accomplishment of the appeal which I had taken from its judgment of July 2. And when the court on September 30, at the closing of the trial term, and in the act of setting the hearing of this motion also for October 11, 1912, failed and refused to preserve to itself the power, if such motion should be granted, to act at its next term with fullness upon the motion I had made on September 19 for a further extension of time within which to file in the court of appeals the transcript of record for the appeal I had taken from the judgment of July 2, I duly, through counsel, excepted to such omission on the part of the court and had my exceptions recorded in a bill which is part of the record of that court touching the matter of extending time under the rule of the court of appeals aforementioned. And when Justice Gould, before whom for consideration on October 11 came the two motions, the one to correct the minute entry of the order of August 19, the other to amend, nunc pro tunc, the order itself, overruled both the said motions, I duly excepted by counsel and had my exceptions preserved by being put into the record by a bill which shows, among other things, that the judge who passed the order of August 19, the entry of which was thus sought to be corrected, and who also was the judge that overruled the application to correct, stated from the bench that he had no personal or independent recollection of either the order or the motion (which was oral) upon which the order was based; and that the person (one of the assistant clerks) who, during that part of the August recess of the court, made in a memorandum book in the court room the rough notes of proceedings (in all branches of the court as then conducted by one judge), which rough notes, so far as they pertained to proceedings in the circuit-court branch of the court, were afterwards by another person formally written up into the minutes of the court, stated that he had no recollection independently of the rough notes made by himself, and he was an assistant clerk whose duties have been generally performed in connection with business in one of the criminal court and not in one of the circuit court branches of the Supreme Court of the District. And this bill of exceptions, which puts upon record all the evidence before the court when it acted upon the two motions aforesaid, constitutes also part of the record of the Supreme Court of the District touching the matter of extending time under the aforementioned rule of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

The sum and substance, therefore, of the return made by Justice Gould to the court of appeals in answer to the rule to show cause why he should not be required to settle the bill of exceptions which had been submitted to the court on September 19 and to himself personally on October 1, seems to be that the respondent, having first made an order in which he refused either to correct the minute entry of an order or to amend the order itself, which had extended time, was by the fact that he had made that order "greatly moved to and aided in reaching the conclusion" to make the further order by which he refused to settle the exceptions that were vital to a review of the judgment of July 2 (from which judgment your petitioner was prosecuting an appeal), inasmuch as the said judgment rested for its validity upon a ruling of the said justice which directed the jury to find in favor of the Capital Traction Co. the issue of fact which existed between your petitioner and the said company, to wit, the issue whether the facts and circumstances besetting the accident that befell your petitioner on December 2, 1909, showed a lack of ordinary care in the Capital Traction Co., your petitioner having declared in his suit that the said company was guilty of actionable negligence in the premises.

10. When Justice Gould, on November 11, 1912, filed his aforesaid return to the court of appeals in the mandamus proceedings, the Capital Traction Co. simultaneously filed in that court a motion to docket and dismiss the appeal which had been taken by me from the aforementioned judgment of July 2, 1912, the motion thus made being based upon the rule of the court of appeals hereinbefore quoted, which rule, according to the aforesaid return of Justice Gould, had "greatly aided" the said trial judge "in reaching the conclusion" not to settle the exceptions which had been taken at the trial.

In opposition to the said motion counsel who acted for me filed in the court of appeals an authenticated copy of that part of the record of the cause in the lower court which showed the acts and proceedings had and done in that court in the matter of extending time for filing in the court of appeals the transcript of record for the appeal aforesaid, the two bills which embraced exceptions as hereinbefore mentioned to the orders of September 30 and of October 16, respectively, being included in the copy of the record thus filed in the court of appeals. Among the things shown in the record thus copied, additionally to things already specified, is the fact that one of the counsel for the Capital Traction Co., a few days after my appeal had been perfected, speaking with one of my own counsel (the one who afterwards asked for an extension of time), said that he was then about to leave the city on his summer vacation and did not expect to return before September 15; that he would like to have time to examine the bill of exceptions after his return; that it would be agreeable to him, therefore, if an extension of time should be taken, say, until October 1; and that he would speak with an associate who would be in the city and who would go into court with my counsel at any time for an order of extension.

Counsel representing me thereupon said he would ask for an extension until September 20, which he did, as hereinbefore stated, on August 19. Forty days, the period fixed by the rule of the court of appeals for filing in that court the transcript of record for an appeal, unless an extension of time is made by the lower court, would have expired for my aforesaid appeal September 12.

The motion of the Capital Traction Co. to docket and dismiss the appeal I had taken from the before-mentioned judgment of July 2, made in the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia on November 11, 1912, as above stated, and the transcript of record from the lower court, filed as aforesaid in opposition to the said motion, were placed upon the general docket of the said court of appeals as cause No. 2478, which cause is entitled "Walter Murphy, appellant, v. The Capital Traction Co., appellee."

The double aspect in which my cause thus appeared in the said court of appeals, to wit, cause No. 393 on the original docket of the said court, wherein I was seeking to procure from the judge of the lower court the allowance of a bill of exceptions (without which my appeal from the judgment of the lower court of July 2, 1912, would be valueless), and cause No. 2478 on the general docket of the said court, wherein the Capital Traction Co. was seeking to have my said appeal docketed and dismissed because the lower court had entered no formal order making an extension of time for the filing in the said court of appeals of the transcript of record for the said appeal, came on for consideration, and the two aspects, or the two causes, involving, as I have explained, the fate of my appeal from the judgment of July 2, were viewed together before the said court of appeals, which heard argument on the same on November 21 and 22. And the said court of appeals thereafter, to wit, on the 2d day of December, 1912, filed its opinion and rendered its judgment in the premises.

A copy, properly certified, of the said opinion and judgment, and of all the acts and proceedings of that court in the premises, including a copy of the complete record of that court in both the causes aforesaid, to wit, No. 393 on its original docket and No. 2478 on its general docket, is attached to this petition to be read and referred to as a part of the petition. The petition is also accompanied by a copy of the brief which counsel presented to the said Court of Appeals in my behalf in each of the two cases aforesaid.

11. When the Court of Appeals decided that it would not require Justice Gould to settle the exceptions taken at the trial, which I had tendered to him in a bill to be settled and signed as aforementioned, and decided also that it would grant the motion of the Capital Traction Co. and docket and dismiss my said appeal, I longingly inquired of counsel if they would prosecute my said appeal into your honorable court. But counsel avised me that they were unable on the said appeal to sue out a writ of error to this honorable court; that they would be glad to represent me further, but that the law did not require your honors, at my instance or request, to review the judgment of the Court of Appeals of the District in the matter of my said appeal. Oh, what could I do? Had I lost my appeal without even the poor consolation of a hearing upon its merits? Where could I turn for help? At best I was but a poor newsboy whose savings at the time of the accident complained of had amounted to less than $900, and those savings long since gone by reason of the physical condition that came upon me as the result of the accident—sight gone and body at times so racked with pain that in my agony I cry out and pray to be put out of my misery, and then anesthetics deaden the pain—only a widowed mother and a few other friends, not great or strong, charged with my care and my only dependence. Who could help me?

It was in a negligence case that your great court, speaking of a jury, an integral part of a common-law trial court, used words which ought to be read and pondered by every trial judge when asked to direct a verdict, namely (Railroad Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall., 657, 664):

"Twelve men of the average of the community, comprising men of education and men of little education, men of learning and men whose learning consists only in what they have themselves seen and heard, the merchant, the mechanic, the farmer, the laborer; these sit together, consult, apply their separate experience of the affairs of life to the facts proven, and draw a unanimous conclusion. This average judgment, thus given, it is the great effort of the law to obtain. It is assumed that 12 men know more of the common affairs of life than does 1 man; that they can draw wiser and safer conclusions from admitted facts thus occurring than can a single judge."

When "one man," "a single judge," had assumed to pass upon the facts in my case and direct the conclusion to be therefrom drawn, thereby substituting his own judgment for the "average judgment" of the jury, I had hoped that his judgment thus rendered touching the determination of an issue of fact, would at least be made the subject of judicial review with a view to ascertaining whether it was proper in the particular case for the judge to perform the functions of the jury and render a verdict, which, if correct, is the verdict the jury would itself have rendered if the case had been submitted to them. At least, I am advised by counsel that the theory of a directed verdict is that the verdict which is directed is just what the jury would have found if the matter had been left to the deliberation of the jury. A review of the ruling of the trial judge in my case could not be had without a bill of the exceptions which had been taken at the trial, and it was your great court which said that the settling of a bill of exceptions did not involve any new or substantial right of the opposing party, the words in one of the cases before your honorable court being as follows (Hunnicutt v. Peyton, 102 U. S., 333, 353):

"When an exception has been taken at the trial and noted, reducing the exception to form afterwards and attesting it, is not making a new case; it is merely verifying the case as it appeared on the trial."

I am advised by counsel that no substantial right of the Capital Traction Co. required the trial judge, at the time and under the circumstances when the bill containing them was tendered, to refuse to settle the exceptions taken at the trial of my suit against the said company, and I am further advised by counsel that the action of the Court of Appeals of the District in the premises shows that that court sacrificed the substantial legal right of an appellant by a failure to see the difference between form and substance as applicable to the matter in hand. Oh! If your honors please, if the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, like Saul of Tarsus, of whom I heard with my mother when she took me a little boy to the Sabbath school to hear the Bible stories there told, thinks itself engaged in a good work, as did Saul when he stood by consenting unto the death of Stephen the martyr, keeping the raiment of them that slew him, can you not cause a light to shine round about and a voice to be heard that shall cause the scales to fall from its eyes that it may see clearly, and then perchance, instead of the Saul who wrought havoc in his blindness, it may be like the Paul, who, after the scales had fallen from his eyes, became the great apostle to the Gentiles, who wrote:

"Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue and if there be any praise, think on these things."

If the legal vision of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia causes it to see things with too technical an eye and too little regard for the real merits of the controversies that come before it, can your honors not perceive the effect upon the judges of the lower courts, who, working under its appellate authority, are constrained to see things in the same light, to the obscuration of substance as distinguished from shadow?

I am told that your honors have the power, if you should choose to exercise it, of issuing to the said court of appeals a writ of certiorari, whereby the case I have described could be brought into this honorable court and reviewed, and such action had as the law and justice may require. And I am told that the fact that I am poor and weak and without influential friends will not operate against me in the eyes of your great court, every member of which when he entered upon his high office took an oath that he would "administer justice without respect to persons, and do equal right to the poor and to the rich," and sealed the oath by kissing the Book that was given to man for his guide and inspiration by the Great Judge before whom we must all finally appear and be judged according to that we have done, whether it be good or bad. And I am told, if your honors deny my petition, that there will then have been written on the judicial page the final chapter of the tragedy which destroyed my sight and wrecked my body, and that the cause of action which I had supposed I possessed against the Capital Traction Co. by reason of negligence on its part will then have been closed in the courts, and I denied consideration of the merits of my cause except at the hands of one man, who himself assumed the rôle of both judge and jury.

You have my petition. My appeal is before you. And I will ever pray.

WALTER MURPHY.

(The following pages, written after the court of appeals had filed its opinion in the case, were appended to the foregoing petition when submitted to the Supreme Court of the United States. References to the record herein made are to the printed copies of the certified record which accompanies the petition wherein Walter Murphy lays his case before the Supreme Court of the United States, with a prayer that the latter court take cognizance of his cause and issue a writ of certiorari to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.)

The rule of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia on the subject of bills of exception provides that the party charged with the preparation of a bill of exceptions shall, at least eight days before submitting it to be settled, have presented a copy of it to opposing counsel. On this feature of the rule the court of appeals in its opinion remarks (p. 24 of the record in No. 393, original):

"His adversary shall have eight days within which to examine the same and express his agreement or his disagreement."

And the court then adds this startling statement:

"In case of agreement, either the justice trying the case or the justice sitting in his stead may sign the same."

This is probably the first time, either in this jurisdiction or any other, that a court of appellate power in common-law causes has ever made the statement that a bill of exceptions, even where the parties were agreed as to its contents, could be signed by any other than the judge to whose rulings the bill was an exception. Signing or attesting is the culminating act which gives to the bill the absolute verity that it has in the eye of the law. And how novel and foreign to all traditions of the law even to suggest that such authentication can be given by a judge who knows nothing whatever of the transactions or rulings referred to in the bill. A few of the States have statutes under which, in the event of the death or permanent disability of the trial judge, the clerk of the court or some other official may certify a bill of exceptions where the parties are agreed concerning it. But give to the rule of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia the full force and effect of a statute (the effect which is claimed by the court of appeals to be proper for all the rules adopted by both the Supreme Court of the District and by itself) "binding upon the court, upon suitors, and upon those who represent suitors," and still we will examine the terms of the rule in vain for any hint or suggestion of such a thought even as that somebody else than the judge whose ruling is excepted to may sign a bill of exceptions therefor.

For a court of the United States that sits in the District of Columbia it would seem that the case of Malony v. Adsit (175 U. S., 281) might be accepted as authority on the question of who must sign a bill of exceptions. In that case counsel for the respective parties had signed a statement that the bill of exceptions was correct and in accordance with the proceedings had in the trial of the cause, and, appending the statement to the bill, had procured the signature of the judge who was then holding the court in which the trial had taken place. The paper so attested was disregarded by the court as not possessing the essential quality of a bill of exceptions.

And still the idea that "the justice sitting in his stead," if the adversary party "expresses his agreement," "may sign the bill of exceptions for the justice who tried the case," is necessary to the view which the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia took of this case; for, if the justice who presided at the trial be absent and it be necessary to settle the bill (and settling, says the court of appeals, can only be done by the trial judge), then, says the court concerning the bill of exceptions:

"Its presentation to him (that is, to the justice who is sitting in the stead of the absent justice) within the time is all that counsel can do."

In such case, says the court:

"The bill may be submitted to the justice presiding in his stead, and acted upon, as of the date of its submission, by the trial justice upon his return to his court."

The words thus used by the court of appeals, spoken by reason of the facts encountered in this case, themselves show that "submitting the bill to the court within 38 days," or within the time to which the 38 days is extended, and "submitting the bill to the court to be settled" (both of which expressions are used in the rule of court) are different things and may be impossible, in a particular case, of occurring simultaneously, and it is only concerning the latter of these two things that any notice whatever to opposing counsel is prescribed by the rule of the court on the subject of bills of exception.

The chief justice, who wrote the opinion of the court, says (pp. 25–26 of the record in No. 393, original):

"In this case the time fixed for settlement of the bill was before the expiration of the extended time, and, though it is not certain, it may be assumed that the two days' notice in writing was given. But the petition shows that the bill of exceptions was delivered to opposing counsel but two days before the expiration of the time."

There is nothing in the record (and certainly nothing outside of the record) to warrant either the doubt or the assumption (with the reasoning consequent thereon (with the court, in the words above quoted, expresses concerning the fact of the notice given or concerning the time designated in the notice for the settling of the bill.

The bill of exceptions was not submitted on September 20, two days after the 18th, when a copy of it had been presented to opposing counsel. It was submitted on September 19, with the express statement to the court that it was not then submitted to be settled; that the settlement of it would have to await the return of Justice Gould, who was the only person that could settle and sign it; that proper notice would be given of the time for settling it, but that the plaintiff desired at that time, under the order of August 19, to submit the bill to the court (see p. 2, also p. 6, of the record in No. 393, original; and p. 16, also pp. 18–19, of the record in No. 2478). And notice of the time for settling was given, not on September 19, but on September 26, and it was given for October 1, the earliest day at which Justice Gould would be available (see p. 3 of the record in No. 393, original; and pp. 19–20 of the record in No. 2478).

If a copy of the bill had been placed in the hands of opposing counsel eight days, instead of one, before September 19, and if the two days' notice had been given for September 19 as the time when the bill would be "submitted to the court to be settled," what would the procedure have amounted to more than the thing that was actually done? It would have been a vain procedure—known to be vain, unless the revolutionary statement, adverted to above, be accepted as correct law, announced for the first time in this case.

The right of appeal, when given by the law, is a right so valuable that the courts in guarding it have almost universally held that the proper course in cases at law is to award a new trial if, by reason of the death or confirmed illness of the trial judge, there is no one who can sign the bill of exceptions requisite to the appeal. For instance, in Henrichsen v. Smith (29 Oreg., 475) the trial judge had extended into the next succeeding term of the court the time within which the appellant could prepare and present his bill of exceptions. Within the time prescribed, but at the succeeding term of the court, the appellant presented his bill, but the trial judge had died and his successor, who was on the bench, set aside the judgment and granted a new trial, because otherwise the appellant, without a bill of exceptions, would have lost his appeal. And, though the owner of the judgment questioned the authority of the court at a subsequent term to set aside the judgment, the supreme court of the State approved what had been done. In like manner, in Crittenden v. Schermerhorn (35 Mich., 370) the trial judge, after his retirement from office, had by stipulation of the parties, signed the bill of exceptions. But the defendant in error raised the objection in the supreme court of the State that a stipulation of the parties could not confer authority to sign a bill of exceptions. Says the court (p. 370):

"The point is well taken. But it does not follow that the judgment should be affirmed. On the contrary, where a party has lost the benefit of his exceptions from causes beyond his control, it is proper to give him a new trial; and this we have done in some cases where the judge's term of office expired before exceptions could be settled. The judgment will therefore be reversed and a new trial ordered."

But in the District of Columbia, so technical in matters of mere procedure is the judicial mind becoming, working under the supervision and direction of the Court of Appeals of the District, that the question with the trial judge, concerning the bill of exceptions in the present case, seems to have been to act, not with a view to aiding the appeal, but to defeating it; and when he was cited to explain the reasons for his action, seeming doubtful of the propriety of his acts under the rule of his own court, he pointed to a rule of the Court of Appeals of the District and said that rule also had influenced him, a rule which prescribed the time within which an appellant must file in the Court of Appeals the transcript of record for his appeal, which time, by the rule referred to, is fixed, even in common law causes, with reference to the perfecting of the appeal and not with reference to the signing or certifying of bills of exception; and though the plaintiff, in the effort to prosecute his appeal, had kept that rule in mind also, both rules were put into action on his appeal in a decision by the Court of Appeals, under which, if that court had only before have gone the length it now has gone, there would have been no necessity or occasion for the trial judge to consider or be influenced by any other than the rule of his own court.

If there be an express order of the court allowing time "to and including the 20th day of September" within which "to submit to the court the bill of exceptions taken at the trial of this cause," and if the bill of exceptions is submitted to the court on September 19; and if there be the further facts that on Sepember 26 notice is given to opposing counsel, in whose hands a copy of the bill thus submitted had been placed on September 18, that the court would be asked to settle and sign the said bill on October 1, the earliest available day, by reason of absence from the city, on which the matter could be submitted to the judge who must settle and sign; and if that notice be gratified by actually placing the bill on October 1 before the judge with the request that he settle and sign; and if, by reason of the trial judge's absence from the city, a two-day extension of the trial term of the court had been asked for and obtained, so as to cause the trial term to embrace October 2; and if the court, whose judgment in most cases is a finality in the District of Columbia, should declare, in the face of such facts, that it was proper to refuse settlement and allowance of the bill of exceptions so submitted, on the sole ground that a copy of the bill had not been presented to opposing counsel at least eight days before September 20, and should base such declaration on the theory (a mere legal mirage) that some other than the trial judge might on September 20 have been able to sign the bill, would such action on the part of the court not indicate a morbid condition of inability to note the difference between matters which are of mere procedure only and matters which are of substantive right; such a condition as is likely, if not checked, soon to obliterate, within the jurisdiction of the court's authority, all differences between justice and flimsily spun legal technicalities, in the name of which justice is so often sacrificed in the courts?

Such facts, followed by such a judgment, are recited in the petition of Walter Murphy and shown in the judicial records upon which his petition is based. That the court, which in most cases is the court of last resort in the District of Columbia, should adjudge such a conclusion from the facts stated would seem to denote a condition which needs a remedy, such a remedy as the Supreme Court of the United States is competent to apply, if only it shall be pleased to do so.

JOHN ALTHEUS JOHNSON.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment providing that all officers of the Navy or Marine Corps shall be credited with the actual time they may have served as officers, enlisted men, paymaster clerks, or clerks of commandants in the Regular or Volunteer Army or Navy, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND submitted an amendment providing that in the event of reductions being made in any force employed under the civil service or in any of the executive departments no honorably discharged soldier, sailor, or marine whose record is rated good shall be discharged or dropped or reduced in rank or salary, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CURTIS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000 for aid and support of the National Library for the Blind, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR DAVIS.

Mr. BRISTOW submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 425), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the President of the Senate pro tempore in arranging for and attending the funeral of the late Senator JEFF DAVIS from the State of Arkansas, vouchers for the same to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

IMPRISONMENTS IN THE ARMY AND NAVY.

Mr. WORKS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 424), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretaries of War and of the Navy be, and they are each, instructed to furnish to the Senate the following information:

1. The number of persons serving in the Army and Navy, respectively, imprisoned during the year 1912, for which offenses, and the term of imprisonment imposed in each case, and the prison or other place of such imprisonment, and the nature and kind of prisons in which incarcerated.

2. The number of such persons, so serving the Government, now serving prison sentences, and for what offense in each case, and the term of imprisonment imposed, for what offenses, and where imprisoned.

PROTECTION OF BIRDS.

Mr. McLEAN. I desire to give notice that on Tuesday, January 14, at the close of the morning business, I will address the Senate on the bill (S. 6497) to protect migratory game and insectivorous birds in the United States.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I move the Senate resume the consideration of House bill 19115, known as the omnibus claims bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts.

Mr. CULLOM. A day or two ago I attempted to introduce an amendment to be referred to the Committee on Claims, and I think it was lost in the shuffle. I do not know whether it was incorporated in the bill or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment, the Chair is informed, is upon the clerk's desk.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask leave now to offer it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As an amendment to the bill?

Mr. CULLOM. As an amendment to the bill under consideration.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What is the character of the amendment?

Mr. CULLOM. It is a longevity claim.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is the report of the Court of Claims attached to it?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. So that it is the same as the other longevity cases?

Mr. CULLOM. It is exactly the same, as I understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the amendment offered by him may be considered, there being a pending amendment which would otherwise be in order. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment will now be considered. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 263 of the bill, after line 9, insert:

To Phil Mitchell, administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo of the estate of William Hoffman, deceased, of Rock Island, Ill., $2,206.30.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I understand from the Senator from Illinois that there accompanies this claim the report from the Court of Claims adjudicating it, and that it is in exactly the same class with similar amendments which the committee has accepted. With that understanding, I make no objection to it, but I ask that the report of the Court of Claims be printed in the proceedings so that we may examine it afterwards, and I reserve the right, if I find any good reason therefor, to ask for a reconsideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is not upon the desk.

Mr. CULLOM. It was attached to the amendment that I offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be procured and printed as requested. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The findings of the court will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Senate Document No. 977, Sixty-second Congress, third session.]

PHIL MITCHELL, ADMINISTRATOR OF THE ESTATE OF WILLIAM HOFFMAN, DECEASED.

Letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Phil Mitchell, administrator of the estate of William Hoffman, deceased, against The United States.

COURT OF CLAIMS, CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, December 3, 1912.

Hon. AUGUSTUS O. BACON,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

SIR: Pursuant to the order of the court, I transmit herewith a certified copy of the findings of fact and conclusion filed by the court in the aforesaid cause, which case was referred to this court by resolution of the United States Senate under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act.

I am, very respectfully, yours, JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

Court of Claims. Congressional, No. 14978–6. Phil Mitchell, administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo of the estate of William Hoffman, deceased, v. The United States.

STATEMENT OF CASE.

This is a claim for longevity pay alleged to be due on account of the service of William Hoffman, late an officer in the United States Army. On the 21st day of June, 1910, the United States Senate referred to the court a bill in the following words:

"[S. 8238, Sixty-first Congress, second session.]

"A bill for the relief of Henry Prince and certain other Army officers and their heirs or legal representatives.

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle, adjust, and pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the claims of * * * William Hoffman * * * officers of the Army of the United States, or their heirs or legal representatives where dead, for longevity pay, according to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases of The United States v. Tyler (105 U. S., 244), The United States v. Morton (112 U. S., 1), and The United States v. Watson (130 U. S., 80)."

Isabella Kobbe appeared in this court October 31, 1910, and filed her petition, in which it is substantially averred that:

She is the daughter and sole heir at law of William Hoffman, deceased, who entered military service of the United States as a cadet at the Military Academy July 1, 1825, and served continuously until the date of his death, August 12, 1884; that longevity pay computed on a basis that his service began on entering said Military Academy was never paid said officer or this claimant; and that additional longevity pay should be paid the claimant reckoned on a basis that his service began on entering said Military Academy, in accordance with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases of Tyler v. The United States (105 U. S., 244), of Morton v. The United States (112 U. S., 1), and of The United States v. Watson (130 U. S., 80); that a claim for all pay and allowances was filed with the Auditor for the War Department and disallowed by that officer; and the claimant claimed $2,451.65.

Phil Mitchell, administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo of the estate of William Hoffman, deceased, was substituted as claimant by order of court October 17, 1912, upon his filing a certificate showing his appointment and qualification as such administrator.

The case was brought to a hearing on its merits on the — day of October, 1912. Frederick A. Fenning, Esq., appeared for the claimant, and the Attorney General, by George M. Anderson, Esq., his assistant and under his direction, appeared for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States.

The court, upon the evidence and after considering the briefs and arguments of counsel on both sides, makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT.

I. The claimant, Phil Mitchell, is the duly appointed administrator de bonis non of the estate of William Hoffman, deceased, and is a citizen of the United States, residing at Rock Island, in the State of Illinois.

II. Said William Hoffman during his lifetime was an officer in the United States Army, having entered the Military Academy as a cadet on July 1, 1825. He graduated therefrom and was appointed second lieutenant July 1, 1829; promoted to be first lieutenant November 16, 1836; captain February 1, 1838; major April 15, 1851; lieutenant colonel October 17, 1860; colonel April 25, 1862; and was retired as such May 1, 1870, and died August 12, 1884.

III. Said decedent was paid his first longevity ration from July 5, 1838; second from July 1, 1839; third from July 1, 1844; fourth from July 1, 1849; fifth from July 1, 1854; sixth from July 1, 1856; seventh from July 1, 1864; and eighth from July 1, 1869.

Under the decisions of the United States Supreme Court in the case of United States v. Watson (130 U. S., 80), claimant would be entitled to additional allowances on account of the service of said decedent amounting to $2,220.25, as reported by the Auditor for the War Department, from which would be deducted overpayments amounting to $13.95, leaving a balance of $2,206.30.

IV. A claim for longevity increase under the act of July 5, 1838 (5 Stats., 256), on account of decedent's service was presented to the accounting officers of the Treasury and was disallowed by them November 29, 1890, for the reason that service as a cadet could not be counted in computing longevity pay and allowances for services prior to February 24, 1881, which disallowance was in accordance with the decisions of the accounting officers in force at the time. Except as above stated, the claim was never presented to any department or officer of the Government prior to its presentation to Congress and reference to this court as hereinbefore set forth in the statement of the case, and no evidence is adduced to show why the claim was not earlier prosecuted.

CONCLUSION.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact the court concludes that the claim herein not having been filed for prosecution before any court within six years from the time it accrued is barred.

The claim is an equitable one against the United States in so far as they received the benefit of the services of said decedent while a cadet at the Military Academy, which service the Supreme Court in the case of The United States v. Watson (130 U. S., 80), decided to be service in the Army.

BY THE COURT.

JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from South Dakota to kindly permit me to offer an amendment which calls for only $163.69, for overdue work in the Washington Navy Yard. It is the case of a poor man, and the findings are here.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator just let me glance at the report of the court?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD (after a pause). There is no objection to it. It is regular.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer the following amendment and submit the findings of fact, which I ask be printed in connection with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being pending an amendment, the amendment is now offered by unanimous consent. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. After line 12, page 153, of the bill, insert:

Richard Allen, $163.69.

The amendment was agreed to.

[Senate Document No. 849, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

RICHARD ALLEN.

Letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Richard Allen v. The United States.

COURT OF CLAIMS, CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, June 4, 1912.

Hon. JAMES S. SHERMAN,
President of the Senate.

SIR: Pursuant to the order of the court, I transmit herewith a certified copy of the findings of fact and conclusion filed by the court in the aforesaid cause, which case was referred to this court by resolution of the United States Senate under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act.

I am, very respectfully, yours, JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

Court of Claims of the United States. Congressional, No. 13727–3. Richard Allen v. The United States.

The claim herein is for services rendered by claimant at the Washington Navy Yard between March 21, 1878, and September 22, 1882, for extra labor above the legal day of eight hours.

On the 19th day of February, 1908, the United States Senate by resolution referred to the court Senate bill No. 5528, which is in the following words:

"A bill for the relief of Joseph M. Padgett and others.

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Joseph M. Padgett and to the others who have joined with him in a petition to this Congress, dated February 17, 1908, the amounts that may be found due to each of them, respectively, for extra labor above the legal day of eight hours, while employed by the United States as workmen, laborers, or mechanics at the various navy yards of the United States, performed by them by reason and under the provisions of circular No. 8, issued by the Secretary of the Navy on March 21, 1878."

Thereafter the claimant above named appeared and filed his petition in this court, in which he avers substantially as follows:

That between March 21, 1878, and September 21, 1882, he was employed by the Government of the United States at the navy yard at Washington, D. C.; that on March 21, 1878, the Secretary of the Navy issued the order referred to in claimant's petition, known as circular No. 8 and hereinafter set forth in Finding I.

That during the six months in each year from the date of said order to the 21st of September, 1882, he worked during all or a portion of the time he was so employed during said period, and that he is entitled to the value of the time worked in excess of 8 hours a day.

The case was brought to a hearing on the evidence and merits on the 28th day of May, 1912.

Messrs. Brandenburg & Brandenburg and Clarence W. De Knight appeared for the claimant, and the Attorney General, by Percy M. Cox, Esq., his assistant and under his direction, appeared for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States.

The court, upon the evidence and after considering briefs and arguments of counsel on both sides, makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT.

I. Between March 21, 1878, and September 22, 1882, the claimant herein was in the employ of the United States in the navy yard at Washington, D. C., during which time the following order was in force:

Circular No. 8.] NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 21, 1878.

The following is hereby substituted to take effect from this date, for the circular of October 25, 1877, in relation to the working hours at the several navy yards and shore stations:

The working hours will be, from March 21 to September 21, from 7 a. m. to 6 p. m.; from September 22 to March 20, from 7.40 a. m. to 4.30 p. m., with the usual intermission of one hour for dinner.

The department will contract for the labor of mechanics, foremen, leading men, and laborers on the basis of 8 hours a day. All workmen electing to labor 10 hours a day will receive a proportionate increase of their wages.

The commandants will notify the men employed or to be employed of these conditions, and they are at liberty to continue or accept employment under them or not.

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

II. Said claimant, while in the employ of the United States as aforesaid, worked on the average in excess of 8 hours a day as follows: 488½ hours, at $2.50 per day, and 39½ hours, at $2.25 per day.

III. If it is considered that 8 hours constituted a day's work during the period from March 21, 1878, to September 22, 1882, under said Circular No. 8, then the claimant has been underpaid $163.69.

IV. The claim herein was never presented to any department or officer of the Government prior to the presentation thereof to Congress and reference to this court as hereinbefore set forth, and no evidence is adduced to show why claimant did not earlier prosecute his said claim.

CONCLUSION.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact the court concludes that the claim herein is not a legal one against the United States and is equitable only in the sense that the Government received the benefit of the services of said claimant in excess of 8 hours a day as above set forth.

[SEAL.] JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] desires to address the Senate further in relation to the pending amendment, which seeks to incorporate the French spoliation claims into the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Before the Senator from Massachusetts begins his speech, I should like to offer an amendment. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill, to have added the claim of Harry Troll, administrator of the estate of Justis McKinstry, deceased. It is a longevity claim of exactly the same nature as others which have been embodied in the bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is there accompanying that a report from the Court of Claims?

Mr. STONE. Fully; yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then, Mr. President, there is no objection. I make the same statement in regard to it as to others, and I ask that the report be printed in the RECORD so that we may have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. STONE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 264, after line 22, under the head of "Missouri," it is proposed to insert the following:

To Harry Troll, of St. Louis, administrator of the estate of Justis McKinstry, deceased, $1,939.11.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The findings of the Court of Claims will be printed in the RECORD.

The findings referred to are as follows:

COURT OF CLAIMS, CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, December 7, 1912.

Hon. AUGUSTUS O. BACON,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

SIR: Pursuant to the order of the court, I transmit herewith a certified copy of the findings of fact and conclusion filed by the court in the aforesaid cause, which case was referred to this court by resolution of the United States Senate under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

Court of Claims. Congressional, 15389, Sub. 4. Harry Troll, administrator of the estate of Justus McKinstry, v. The United States.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE.

On the 21st day of February, 1911, Senate bill 10806, Sixty-first Congress, third session, for the relief of Justus McKinstry, or his heirs or legal representatives, where dead, for longevity pay, was referred to this court by a resolution of the United States Senate for findings of fact under the terms of section 14 of the act approved March 3, 1887.

Said bill reads as follows:

"A bill for the relief of Christopher H. McNally and certain other Army officers and their heirs or legal representatives.

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle, adjust, and pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the claims of Christopher H. McNally, William C. Forbush, John Nichols Coe, Alexander Logan Morton, Justus McKinstry, Arthur Hubert Burnham, Edward McK. Hudson, Joseph Hale, Wentz Curtis Miller, Redmond Tully, Augustus G. Tassin, and Edward Maxwell Wright, officers of the Army of the United States, or their heirs or legal representatives where dead, for longevity pay, according to section 15 of the act of July 5, 1838 (5 Stat. L., p. 258), and acts amendatory thereof, and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases of the United States against Tyler (105 U. S., p. 244), the United States against Morton (112 U. S., p. 1), and the United States against Watson (130 U. S., p. 80)."

That Harry Troll is the administrator of the estate of Justus McKinstry, late of St. Louis, State of Missouri, and that he is a citizen of the United States and a resident of the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri.

That Justus McKinstry served in the United States Army as follows:

"Cadet, M. A., July 1, 1833; second lieutenant, Second Infantry, July 1, 1838; first lieutenant, April 18, 1841; captain, January 12, 1848; captain acting quartermaster, March 3, 1847; major and quartermaster, August 3, 1861; brigadier general of Volunteers, September 2, 1861, which expired July 17, 1862; dismissed January 28, 1863; died December 11, 1897."

and by reason of such service is entitled to longevity pay, computing the time he served at the Military Academy as a cadet, in accordance with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States as laid down in the case of the United States v. Watson (130 U. S. Rep., p. 80) and United States v. Tyler (105 U. S. Rep., p. 244), which has never been paid to the deceased officer or his heirs.

That application for such longevity increase pay was made to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, but said claim was disallowed on the 8th day of January, 1891, on the ground "Service as a cadet under the existing laws and decisions can not be counted in computing longevity pay and allowances for services prior to February 24, 1881," contrary to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases of Watson and Tyler, above stated.

Application was again made for same longevity increase pay in accordance with the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury in the case of Alexander O. Brodie (14 Comp. Dec., p. 795), but this application was disallowed in May, 1909, on the ground that there was no authority of law to reopen an adverse settlement made by a predecessor, irrespective of the fact that the law now favors the settlement of this class of cases.

That there is due the claimant under the law as decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of United States v. Watson and Tyler, above stated, the following amount of longevity increase pay:

First longevity ration from July 5, 1838, to June 30, 1843	$364.40
Second longevity ration from July 5, 1843, to June 30, 1848	365.40
Third longevity ration from July 5, 1848, to June 30, 1853	365.20
Fourth longevity ration from July 5, 1853, to June 30, 1858	438.20
Fifth longevity ration from July 5, 1858, to June 30, 1863	407.30
Total	1,940.50
Balance	1,941.11

That the deceased, Justus McKinstry, was loyal to the United States throughout the War of the Rebellion, he having served during said rebellion until the 28th day of January, 1863, when his service from the Army of the United States was severed.

The case was brought to a hearing on loyalty and merits on the 23d day of October, 1912.

Lyon & Lyon appeared for the claimant, and the Attorney General, by George M. Anderson, Esq., his assistant, and under his direction, appeared for the defense and protection of the interest of the United States.

The court, upon the evidence and after considering the briefs and arguments of counsel upon both sides, makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT.

I. Claimant's decedent, Justus McKinstry, was an officer in the United States Army, having entered the United States Military Academy as a cadet on July 1, 1833. He graduated therefrom and was appointed second lieutenant, Second United States Infantry, July 1, 1838; promoted first lieutenant April 18, 1841; captain and acting quartermaster March 3, 1847; major and quartermaster August 3, 1861; appointed brigadier general of Volunteers September 6, 1861, and served as such to July 17, 1862. He was dismissed January 28, 1863.

II. Said decedent was paid his first longevity ration from July 1, 1843, and one additional ration for each five years subsequent thereto. Under the Watson decision he would be entitled to additional allowances amounting to $1,939.11, as reported by the Auditor for the War Department.

III. The claim herein was presented to the accounting officers of the Treasury and the same was disallowed January 8, 1891, and again in 1910.

Except as above stated, the claim has never been presented to any department or officer of the Government prior to its presentation to Congress and reference to this court as aforesaid.

CONCLUSION.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact the court concludes that the claim herein, not having been filed for prosecution before any court within six years from the time it accrued, is barred.

The claim is an equitable one against the United States, in so far as they received the benefit of the service of said decedent while a cadet at the Military Academy, which service the Supreme Court, in the case of the United States v. Watson (130 U. S., 80), decided was service in the Army.

[SEAL.] JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask, first, for the adoption of an amendment in a case of longevity pay, the same as those amendments that have already, I think, been adopted.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is there a report accompanying it?

Mr. LODGE. There is a report accompanying it, and the findings of fact may be read, if the Senator desires, or placed in the RECORD.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will not ask that they be read, but I ask that they be printed in the RECORD in connection with the amendment, so that we may examine them.

Mr. LODGE. This is precisely the same as all other longevity cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 241, after line 12, it is proposed to insert:

To Katharine B. Thomson, administratrix de bonis non cum testamento annexo of the estate of Francis Beach, deceased, of Plymouth, Mass., $1,612.33.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The findings of the Court of Claims in relation to the case will be printed in the RECORD.

The findings referred to are as follows:

COURT OF CLAIMS, CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, December 3, 1912.

Hon. AUGUSTUS O. BACON,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

SIR: Pursuant to the order of the court, I transmit herewith a certified copy of the findings of fact and conclusion filed by the court in the aforesaid cause, which case was referred to this court by resolution of the United States Senate under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act.

I am, very respectfully, yours, JOHN RANDOLPH,
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

Court of Claims. Congressional, No. 14199. Katharine B. Thomson, administratrix de bonis non cum testamento annexo of the estate of Francis Beach, deceased, v. The United States.

STATEMENT OF CASE.

This is a claim for longevity pay alleged to be due on account of the service of Francis Beach, late an officer in the United States Army. On the 3d day of March, 1909, the United States Senate referred to the court a bill in the following words;

"[S. 9529, Sixtieth Congress, second session.]

"A bill for the relief of Francis Beach and certain other Army officers and their heirs or legal representatives.

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle, adjust, and pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the claims of Francis Beach * * * officers of the Army of the United States, or their heirs or legal representatives where dead, for longevity pay according to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases of The United States v. Tyler (105 U. S., 244), The United States v. Morton (112 U. S., 1), and The United States v. Watson (130 U. S., 80)."

Katharine B. Thomson appeared in this court December 1, 1910, and filed her petition, in which it is substantially avered that she is the daughter and heir at law of Francis Beach, who entered the military service of the United States as a cadet at the Military Academy July 1, 1853, and served continuously until the date of his death, February 5, 1873; that longevity pay computed on a basis that his service began on entering said Military Academy was never paid said officer or the claimant, and that additional longevity pay should be paid the claimant reckoned on a basis that his service began on entering said Military Academy, in accordance with the decisions of the United States Supreme Court in the cases of Tyler v. The United States (105 U. S., 244), of Morton v. The United States (112 U. S., 1), and of The United States v. Watson (130 U. S., 80); that a claim for all pay and allowances due was filed with the Auditor for the War Department and disallowed by that officer, and the claimant claimed $2,113.60.

By order of court of October 17, 1912, Katharine B. Thomson, administratrix de bonis non cum testamento annexo of the estate of Francis Beach, was substituted as claimant upon her filing a certificate showing her appointment and qualification as such administratrix.

The case was brought to a hearing on its merits on the 21st day of October, 1912. Messrs. Coldren & Fenning appeared for the claimant, and the Attorney General, by George M. Anderson, Esq., his assistant and under his direction, appeared for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States.

The court, upon the evidence and after considering the briefs and arguments of counsel on both sides, makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT.

I. The claimant, Katharine B. Thomson, is a citizen of the United States, residing at Plymouth, Mass., and is the duly appointed administratrix of the estate of Francis Beach, deceased.

II. Said Francis Beach entered the United States military service as a cadet at the Military Academy July 1, 1853. He graduated therefrom and was appointed second lieutenant July 1, 1857; promoted to first lieutenant April 29, 1861; captain August 14, 1862, and died February 5, 1873. He was paid his first longevity ration from July 1, 1862, and one additional ration for each five years subsequent thereto.

III. Under the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of United States v. Watson (130 U. S., 80), claimant is entitled to additional longevity allowances amounting to $1,675, as reported by the Auditor for the War Department, from which should be deducted $63.45 due the United States on account of overpayments to said decedent, leaving a balance due of $1,612.33.

IV. A claim for longevity increase on account of cadet service of said decedent was presented to the accounting officers of the Treasury and was disallowed by them November 12, 1890, for the reason that as said decedent was not in the service after February 24, 1881, service as a cadet could not be counted in computing longevity pay under existing laws and decisions.

Except as above stated the claim was never presented to any department or officer of the Government prior to its presentation to Congress and reference to this court, as hereinbefore set forth in the statement of the case, and no evidence is adduced to show why claimant did not earlier presnt her said claim.

CONCLUSION.

Upon the foregoing findings of fact the court concludes that the claim herein, not having been filed for prosecution before any court within six years from the time it accrued, is barred.

The claim is an equitable one against the United States in so far as they received the benefit of the service of said decedent while a cadet at the Military Academy, which service the Supreme Court in the case of United States v. Watson (130 U. S., 80) decided was service in the Army.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before going on with a discussion of the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to my amendment, I desire to place in the RECORD, and call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota to it, a statement which I received in regard to another case which was voted on here and rejected by a vote of the Senate. I do this only in justice to the people involved. It is the Flower claim for the destruction of property in Virginia by forces of the United States during the Civil War. The Senator from South Dakota will probably recall the case, as we had some considerable discussion about it. Objection was then made, among other objections, that the owner of the property in whose name the claim was made by his heirs had never himself made the claim, and various other points were raised against the claim. In justice to the people who make the claim, I wish to call attention to some of the facts contained in the letter which I hold in my hand, which I will then ask to have printed in the RECORD. The writer is the son of the owner of the property. He says:

My father, Thomas Brinton Flower, was a clergyman of the Episcopal Church, and had charge of the Church of the Messiah at Woods Hole, Mass., for nine years previous to the opening of the war. In September, 1861, he removed with his family to Ashfield, in this county, where he died in June, 1862, nearly three years previous to the damage to his property in Virginia. A very conclusive reason, it seems to me, why he never himself laid claim for any damage.

He then goes on and gives an account of the whole thing. I think, in justice to the claimants, that the letter ought to be printed. It simply shows, in my opinion, that they were entitled to the claim. I ask the Senator from South Dakota to read the letter as it will appear in the RECORD. I will not detain the Senate to read it all, but it explains about the laches and gives the full details. I ask that the letter may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I simply want to say upon that point that the report of the committee is based entirely upon the result of an examination of the findings returned by the Court of Claims and the opinion given by the Court of Claims. The committee can not, and no Committee on Claims could, go outside of the findings returned by the Court of Claims and examine into matters beyond the record. To do so would be an utter physical impossibility. The Court of Claims was created to do that work for us, to make these findings and these conclusions for our guidance. If we were to go into that sort of investigation of this claim to which the Senator from Massachusetts calls attention, I dare say there are 1,500 other claims which it could be urged from one cause or another would justify an examination outside of the findings of the Court of Claims. My request is that we allow all matters of that kind to go to conference, and if the conferees feel in any particular case that a claim is unusual and that it demands some exception, they can give it that attention; but, as I have said, it is utterly impossible for the Senate to undertake to deal with such cases.

Mr. LODGE. I think the Senator from South Dakota misunderstood me. I did not mean to reopen the case or to move to reconsider the vote of the Senate, but the Senator heretofore, when debating the case, said the man who owned the property never made any claim. Well, the man who owned the property died three years before the damage occurred, and therefore could hardly have made the claim. I merely, as that was going outside of the record, sought only, in justice to the people who made the claim, to show that in that respect, at least, they were not to blame, and also to give a full account of the transaction. I do not suppose the claim will be in conference, as I do not understand it is embraced in the House bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then, it is not in the House bill?

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That will make it all the more impossible for us to act on it here, because, if we could put it in the bill, the House having never acted upon it, at this stage of the proceedings, with this session coming to an end on the 4th of March, it would be utterly impossible. I would say to the Senator, for it to receive favorable consideration.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that. I told the Senator I did not expect it would be possible to reverse the action of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota object to the publication in the RECORD of the letter?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Oh, no; certainly not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

GREENFIELD, MASS., December 19, 1912.

The Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR LODGE:

The debate which you forwarded is conclusive to my mind that the facts which actually exist are not known either to you or the other Senators.

My father, Thomas Brinton Flower, was a clergyman of the Episcopal Church and had charge of the Church of the Messiah at Woods Hole, Mass., for nine years previous to the opening of the war. In September, 1861, he removed with his family to Ashfield, in this county, where he died in June, 1862, nearly three years previous to the damage to his property in Virginia—a very conclusive reason, it seems to me, why he never, himself, laid claim for any damage.

At that time I was a boy of 9; my mother was left with four small children, one older and two younger than myself. John Flower, who lived on the farm in Virginia, was brother to my father and was one of the men who voted that Virginia stay in the Union. He was arrested and placed in prison, from which he escaped, and for three months suffered untold hardship in his attempt to reach the North. He lived long enough after the war to go to Virginia and mark out the bounds of this farm and get it properly recorded. He informed my mother that everything had been done to protect her rights, the property having been taken by military authority for the preservation of the Army and had been properly appraised.

In the operations around Petersburg this farm was occupied by the Union forces and finally destroyed. The house was shelled by both armies while my Aunt Mary and 11 small children were in the cellar. After the engagement, the Union forces taking possession of the property, the family was sent North, with the exception of the oldest son, who was then about 16 and well acquainted with the surrounding country, who stayed for a time and aided Gen. Grant in his operations by showing the soldiers short cuts about the country.

There were three earth forts and hundreds of rods of earthworks throwa up on this farm.

In regard to laches in this matter, let me say that my mother went to Philadelphia, where my father was born, after his death, and that Col. Samuel B. Thomas, who married my father's sister, and who was secretary of state under Gov. Curtin during the war, told my mother that nothing could be done toward collecting the claim owing to the condition of the country; that appraisement of damages had been filed and that later the matter could be taken up.

She did later take the matter up in the seventies with some claim agent. What was done, I do not know. But the inclosed letter from Mr. Polluck will show you that I took the matter up with him in 1889.

Congressman Whiting, from this district, who is related by marriage to the family, took the matter up when in Congress and did not accomplish anything. Then Mr. Black, the present agent, took hold of the matter and has had it in charge for some years. You will see by this that there has been no neglect on our part toward pressing this claim. Mr. Black has always said that if we could interest you in the matter the thing would go through. So when Harold had the great pleasure of making your acquaintance the matter was brought to your attention.

My father, as I have learned from my mother, was a strong Union man. He voted, as I have been told, for Bell and Everett at the election when Mr. Lincoln was made President. The Flower family, or our branch of it, which came over with William Penn on his second trip, located in Delaware County, Pa., and have been there ever since. My father's sister was a very warm friend of Miller McKim, and was associated in some way with what was called the "underground railroad."

I have burdened you with this long letter, for which I hope you will excuse me, to show you if I could that it was impossible for any charge of disloyalty to be made against my father or any of the family, and to show that we have not been negligent in pressing this claim, but rather unfortunate.

Again thanking you for your great kindness in this matter, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

ARCHIBALD D. FLOWER.

Mr. LODGE. I think that some injustice, quite unintentionally, has been done to these most excellent people who are making the claim and who never would have made it unless they believed it was a thoroughly good one, as I believe it is. I wanted those facts placed before the Senate so that they could be before a subsequent committee and so that they may learn all the details, which are not without interest.

Mr. President, in discussing the amendment which the Senator from South Dakota proposed to the amendment offered by me I first showed how many grounds of claim put forward by the counsel for the French spoliation claimants have been satisfied by the court, in order to show that the court had not granted everything claimed, by any means, but that they had made a number of rulings which the claimants at least thought bore very hardly upon them.

I refer to what I have said previously, because so much time has elapsed since I first made those observations that I fear they have been forgotten even by the very small number of auditors I had the privilege of having.

I now want, Mr. President, to take up the question raised by the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota to the amendment which I introduced. I desire to refer to the claims included by the Court of Claims in their present decisions, and I wish to discuss the precedents of allowances by courts and commissions passing on international claims.

The French spoliation act of 1885, under which these claims are considered by the Court of Claims (23 Stat. L., 283), thus prescribed, in section 3, the rule of decision:

> And they shall decide upon the validity of said claims according to the rules of law, municipal and international, and the treaties of the United States applicable to the same.

It will hardly be denied that this requirement laid upon the court the obligation to decide these cases according to the rules of law which had received the approval of our own highest domestic tribunals, as well as of the various commissions and courts which had from time to time in our past history adjudicated upon international claims.

A careful examination of the published records and decisions of a number of these tribunals shows that the allowances made by the court have in no case gone beyond those made by past courts and commissions, which have considered these claims at various times during the last hundred years. In many instances they have been less liberal than the allowances made by past commissions.

The questions suggested by a number of the remarks made in the summaries given in the last part of the Senate report show that the question of the correctness of at least the three following classes of allowances has been under consideration by the committee, and the deduction of these items is at least suggested in the report:

First. The freight earnings of the vessel for the voyage. These have been allowed by the Court of Claims at the rate of two-thirds of a fair freight for the voyage.

Second. The premium of insurance paid by the owner of the cargo or of the vessel upon her for the voyage upon which she was bound, which is allowed by the Court of Claims as one element entering into the value, and which would undoubtedly have been charged by the owner as one element of the expenses he had incurred to the purchaser of the cargo if the vessel and cargo had safely arrived at their point of destination.

Third. The payment of the full amount of loss incurred and paid by individual underwriters on vessels and cargoes, the question here being whether the premium is not to be deducted from the insurer's loss. Various comments throughout the report make it evident that one thought in drafting this report has been that the underwriter did not lose the whole amount which he paid, and that his net loss was only the amount paid less the premium he received for incurring the risk.

My examination of the proceedings to which I have referred shows that all of these items have always been allowed in full by past commissions passing on international claims, and are sustained in principle by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, while there are other important items of allowance arising out of losses which the Court of Claims has not allowed.

A question very similar to this occurred in the settlement of our claims against Great Britain before the mixed international commission appointed under the Jay treaty of 1794. These claims were for spoliations committed by the British under circumstances entirely analogous to those committed by the French now in question.

William Pinkney, of Maryland, was commissioner on the part of the United States in that commission, whose opinion, delivered on behalf of the majority of the commission, was as follows in answer to a very similar objection made by the British commissioner:

> The last question which occurred at the board in this case respected the rule of compensation to be applied to it in relation to the cargo. The majority were of opinion that the claimants were entitled not only to the value of their merchandise but to the net profits which would have been made on it at the port of destination if the voyage had not been interrupted. This opinion proceeded upon the supposition that the voyage was wrongfully interrupted, and upon that supposition would seem to be free from exception. It has been questioned, however, and I shall, of course, assign my reasons for adopting it.
> There can be no doubt that the illegal capture and condemnation of this vessel and cargo have given to the claimants a title to receive from the British Government the value of the things of which they were deprived; but the question is whether they have not also a title to receive the profits that might and would have arisen from them.
> The right of the claimants to the cargo was a perfect one; and for that reason they are authorized to demand compensation for its value; but this right was in no respect better or more perfect than their right to proceed upon the voyage, and to make such profit of the goods as the situation of the destined market would at the time of the vessel's arrival enable them under all circumstances to make.
> When the claimants show (and a majority of the board have determined that they have shown it) that the cargo belonged to them—that the voyage which the vessel (also the property of one of them) had commenced was a lawful one; that there was no ground upon which she could justifiably be seized or detained, they prove a complete right to prosecute that voyage without molestation and to acquire such advantages therefrom as in the course of trade might fairly be calculated on.

According to a written opinion filed by one of the board on this occasion, no compensation is due for the violation of this latter right; for it states "that to reimburse the claimants the original cost of their property and all the expenses they have actually incurred, together with interest on the whole amount, would be a just and adequate compensation." But what substantial reason can be assigned why one of the claimant's rights shall be selected as a proper object of compensation, while another of their rights, equally indisputable and equally violated, shall be left without any compensation at all?

No compensation for an injury can be just and adequate which does not repair that injury, but he who wrongfully deprives me of a lawful profit which I am employed in making can not be said to afford reparation until he has given me an equivalent for the advantages of which he has deprived me; to which advantages my right was as unquestionable as the right I had in the things from which they were to arise.

Rutherforth (1 Inst. Nat. Law, p. 105, s. 5) lays down the rule that "in estimating the damages which anyone has sustained, where such things as he has a perfect right to, are unjustly taken from him, or withholden, or intercepted, we are to consider not only the value of the thing itself, but the value likewise of the fruits or profits that might have arisen from it. He who is the owner of the thing is likewise the owner of such fruits or profits. So that it is as properly a damage to be deprived of them as it is to be deprived of the thing itself. But it is to be considered whether he could have received these profits without any labor or expense; because if he could not, then in settling the damages for which reparation is to be made, the profits are not to be rated at their full worth; but an allowance is to be made for the labor or expense of collecting or receiving them, and when the labor or expense is deducted from their full worth the remainder is all that he has lost, and consequently is all that he has any title to demand.

"In rating the damages which a man has sustained we are to estimate something more than the present advantage which he has lost; for the hope or expectation of future advantage is worth something; and if such hope or expectation is cut off by the injury, the value of it is to be allowed him. We must, however, in estimating this hope be careful not to estimate it as if the advantage were in actual possession. Proper deductions are to be made for the accidents which might have happened to disappoint his expectations. And in proportion as these accidents are greater or more in number, or more likely to happen, a greater abatement is to be made in consideration of them," etc. (Id., p. 416.)

"Not only the damages which a man sustains from an unlawful act are chargeable to them who do the act, but these damages are likewise to be made amends for, which are the consequence of such act." (Id., p. 409, s. 8.)

The foregoing quotations are supported by Grotius (Lib., 2, c. 17, s. 4–5) and also by Puffendorf. It is to be admitted that in the case before the board, the claimants' prospect of profits (provided insurance had not been made upon both profits and cargo) was not entirely certain; for the cargo might have been damaged or lost, and, of course, in the language of Rutherforth, we should be careful "not to estimate those profits as if they were in actual possession." But it is also evident that the profits were just as secure as the cargo itself, and were subject to no other risk than the cargo was exposed to. With a view to prices, there was no risk at all, since we resort to the prices which are proved to have been those at which the cargo might have been sold if it had arrived. In that respect we have facts by which to regulate our estimate, and not possibilities. If then the danger of loss of, or injury to, the cargo was the only circumstance which rendered the claimants' profits precarious, it is extremely easy to make an allowance for that hazard in the same manner as in ascertaining the value of the cargo itself. We have only to make a proper deduction for the sea risk—and for this the rate of insurance upon such a voyage as the vessel was engaged in will furnish us with the best possible rule. The rate of insurance is the value of the hazard, and it is that criterion upon which we may safely rely, since it is that value which is uniformly paid and received for the sea risk by those who are able, from their pursuits, and induced by their interests to calculate it accurately. (Life, Writings, and Speeches of William Pinkney by Henry Wheaton, New York, 1826, pp. 259–264.)

That is an extremely able argument, and, as the Senate well knows, Mr. Pinkney was one of the ablest and most distinguished lawyers in our history, and it has a very important bearing upon the question of the profits of the voyage.

I merely call attention to the fact that of this commission of 1794, where the cases were precisely similar to the class of cases involved in the French spoliation cases, the majority of the commission, which was a very strong one, overruled the position taken on behalf of the British Government that the whole liability of that Government was discharged by reimbursing the claimants the original cost of their property, all the expenses they had incurred, and interest on the whole amount.

Under the Florida treaty of 1819 with Spain we had another commission for the settlement of claims against Spain. This commission, however, differed from the British commission of 1794, to which I have just been referring, in the fact that it was a domestic tribunal of the United States, like the Court of Claims, and like the board of commissioners who distributed the Alabama award. They adjudicated upon claims originally existing against a foreign government, but which had, for a valuable consideration, been released to that government and assumed by the United States. So the Florida commission is entirely similar in its jurisdiction to the Court of Claims, and it was dealing in claims almost identical with the class of claims we are considering here.

That commission in its final report of its proceedings to the Secretary of State thus stated its allowance of freight and insurance premiums and of the principles which governed it in making such allowances (Moore's International Arbitrations, vol. 5, p. 4516):

In adjusting the amount of the claims allowed the commission has adopted these principles: Regarding the fund provided by the treaty as designed to indemnify claimants for actual losses sustained and not to realize profits which might or might not have been made, the board has generally taken up the voyage at its commencement and allowed the value of the vessel and cargo at that time. To the value of the vessel two-thirds of a fair freight for the passage in which the loss occurred has been added. A fair premium of insurance for the risk of such a passage has been also added to each of these insurable subjects. And the costs and expenses incurred in defraying their rights have been allowed to all claimants who have paid such and have offered any evidence from which the sums so paid might be inferred. Such has been the general mode of estimating the quantum of loss to be indemnified in most of the cases where the loss has been total.

The following from the report of that commission (Moore's International Arbitrations, vol. 5, pp. 4516, 4517) states the ground on which the claims of underwriters were allowed and also shows that in so doing no deduction of the amount of the premium was made from the amount of the insurance actually paid by the underwriter and received by the assured. The commission say:

And it was only when the American citizen who had sustained a loss provided for by the treaty, having been indemnified against this loss by an American underwriter, had abandoned or was bound to abandon and assign his interest in the subject insured to the assurer, that the claims of underwriters have ever been received. But, claiming as assignees of a party who had a good claim, these their derivative claims have always been allowed for the sum by them insured and paid, where that sum did not exceed the true value of the subject insured according to the principles settled by the board for ascertaining this value, as above stated.

In making such allowances to underwriters the commission was well aware that its effect would be to allow them more than they had lost by the amount of the premium received from the party insured, which premium he had voluntarily paid and must have lost in any event. So, too, in making the allowance of freight the commission was well aware that the full wages of seamen had not been paid, probably, in any of the cases where such freight was given. But in these and many other cases which occurred the board, having ascertained the full amount of the loss, distributed this amount so ascertained amongst the different parties claiming it before them and seeming to have a right to receive it (no matter in what character) without deciding or believing itself possessed of the authority to decide upon the merits of conflicting claims to the same subject.

It will be observed that in that decision of the Florida commission they awarded the claimants the premiums, although the premiums would have been lost in any event, and they also made an allowance of freight without deduction, as they state—

For wages of seamen.

I ask particular attention to this last statement as bearing upon the point which has been made against a number of these claims in the report of the Committee on Claims, in which the amount allowed to an underwriter by the Court of Claims as insurance actually paid has been diminished by the amount of the premium. As I have pointed out, the commission, under the treaty of 1819, made no such deduction, but allowed the underwriters the full amount of the loss, which they paid.

Its reasons are given for so doing. It is not believed that any court or commission which has ever allowed to an underwriter or insurer by virtue of the doctrine of subrogation the amount which he paid has ever diminished that amount by deducting therefrom the premium paid for the insurance.

But there was another commission relative to certain other claims against the Spanish Government which sat many years later than the first, to wit, in 1836 and 1837. That commission laid down the following complete statement of the rules which guided them (Moore's International Arbitrations, vol. 5, pp. 4541, 4542):

First. As to vessels: The value of every vessel must be estimated at her actual cost to the owner where that can be ascertained, and if not ascertained, her value at the commencement of the voyage will be deemed to be her true value, deducting therefrom a reasonable percentage for subsequent deterioration.

To her value thus allowed add two-thirds of a fair freight where the voyage was not completed.

In cases of capture and release, where doubts exist as to the probable grounds of capture, nothing is to be allowed for the detention of the vessel after capture, unless the delay has been unreasonable, and then only for the wages of the crew, expenses of their support, and damages incurred by the vessel during the detention.

Second. As to cargo: In cases where the cargo has been taken at sea the invoice cost will be deemed to be its true value, adding thereto the usual and ordinary shipping charges, the customary brokerage on the purchase of the goods, and a reasonable or fair premium of insurance for the particular voyage, said premium to be rated with that usual or current at the time of the shipment, and this premium is to be allowed whether the owner was his own insurer or not.

Where the property was seized on shore at the place of destination, and the market price there at the time of seizure can be satisfactorily ascertained, that price shall be the criterion of value. If from any cause such market price can not be ascertained, recourse must be had to the actual cost and charges as in other cases.

Third. Charges and expenses in defending the property, whether vessel or cargo, will be allowed where they have been actually paid in all cases where there has been a reasonable effort to defend or reclaim the subject.

Fourth. Where the property was recaptured and restored on payment of salvage the amount so paid, with incidental expenses, is to be allowed. In cases of ransom the actual sum paid is to be allowed, and where the property has been sold after capture and a proportion of its proceeds given up as the price of a partial restitution the sum so given up is to be deducted from the indemnity to be allowed.

Fifth. As to freight: A fair premium of insurance is to be allowed on freight, as on other insurable interests.

Sixth. In the distribution of the amount awarded reference is to be had only to the claimant's actual loss. Nothing is to be allowed for profits or anticipated gains. Whatever he has received under contracts of insurance is to be deducted from the award in his favor; but where insurers are claimants their claims are generally to be allowed for the sums actually paid, except in cases of loss especially adjusted between the parties, and then the intention of the parties at the time of settling their contracts is to be carried into effect.

These rules exclude the possible profit on which Mr. Pinkney made his argument, but in many other respects they are more liberal than those adopted by the Court of Claims. Premiums of insurance, for instance, were allowed by that commission whether they were actually paid or not, whereas the Court of Claims allowed such premiums only when actually paid. Charges and expenses in connection with the property were allowed by this commission, whereas we find no case in which the Court of Claims allowed such charges.

The Court of Claims allowed no ransom voluntarily paid, but only salvage actually decreed by a court and paid under compulsion.

Insurance on freight is only allowed by the Court of Claims where actually paid. The commission above quoted allowed it in addition to the freight itself in all cases.

Now, Mr. President, that shows as clearly as possible that the Court of Claims in dealing with these cases has been stricter and more severe than past commissions dealing with similar claims made under the Spanish and British treaties.

I will take next the case of the distribution of the Danish indemnity. Our Government had made a treaty with Denmark for the adjudication of claims in the case of vessels illegally seized by that country. That commission, sitting in 1832–33, made these rules (Moore's International Arbitrations, vol. 5, p. 4568):

Considering the absence of proof in some cases, and its imperfection in others, in relation to freight, insurance, demurrage, and damage owing to detention, and consequently, that exact justice can not be done in each particular case, comparing, besides, the several claims for freight, insurance, demurrage, and damage, with each other, and finding no standard therein, it is—

2d. Ordered, That in all cases of condemnation or detention there shall be allowed two-thirds of a fair freight for the passage in which the loss occurred (and) a premium of insurance at the rate of — per cent upon the value of the vessel and cargo, respectively, at the commencement of the voyage.

That was in reference, as I remember, to the stoppage of vessels in regard to the question of tolls in the Skagerrack, passing through the straits north of Denmark.

There was also an indemnity paid by the Government of Naples for illegal seizures made by that Government.

The commission to distribute that indemnity, sitting in 1834, 1835, made the following rules (Moore's International Arbitrations, vol. 5, p. 4585):

Ordered, 1. That in cases of condemnation, indemnity shall be made according to the actual value of the vessel and cargo, respectively, at the commencement of the voyage.

2. That a commission of 2½ per cent be allowed on the value of the cargo in full satisfaction for the purchase and charges thereon at the port of exportation.

3. Freight according to the registered tonnage of the vessel at and after the rate of $40 per ton.

4. All necessary expenses incurred at Naples by reason of illegal capture and condemnation to be allowed in full.

5. Interest at the rate of 20 per cent on the amount awarded.

I wish to call attention to the allowance of interest at the rate of 20 per cent, the largest yet found, although in all cases of commissions to distribute international indemnities interest is invariably allowed, whereas the Court of Claims has never allowed interest on French spoliation claims.

THE MEXICAN COMMISSION OF 1868.

In 1868 there was a Mexican commission to settle certain claims against that Government.

Sir Edward Thornton, the British minister, who was the umpire under the treaty of 1868 for the settlement of claims of the citizens of the United States against Mexico, made the following allowance of freight in a case of unlawful seizure of goods imported by sea and seized at the port of importation:

The umpire therefore feels it incumbent upon him to decide this claim is a just one and to award on account of it the sum of $7,145.85 Mexican gold, with interest at 6 per cent per annum from the 1st of December, 1854, to the date of the final award. The umpire has allowed the original value of the goods, with the costs of freight, landing, etc.; but he has not taken into consideration the profit upon the sale of the goods, because he thinks that the loss of this is sufficiently compensated by the assured interest of 6 per cent per annum at the end of a number of years. (Moore's International Arbitrations, vol. 3, p. 3135.)

This decision is a particularly strong one because it not only allows freight and expenses of landing in addition to the original value of the goods, but its refusal to allow profits is based upon the distinct ground that these are compensated for by the interest, which in that case exceeded the amount of the principal. In these French spoliation cases neither profits nor interest are allowed, which, I think, shows the moderation of these claims and the strictness of the Court of Claims in dealing with them as compared with all similar claims dealt with by prior commissions in similar cases in which the Government was involved.

PROCEEDINGS OF COURT OF COMMISSIONERS OF ALABAMA CLAIMS.

The proceedings of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims on this subject of the allowance of freights and insurance premiums throw great light on the questions involved.

The proceedings of this court offer a peculiarly instructive analogy to those now before use. The claims, like the French spoliation claims, were in their origin claims arising out of the wrongful acts of a foreign government. Like them, the claims had been assumed by the United States, although upon different grounds than the French spoliation claims, having been so assumed in consideration of the payment of a large lump sum by the foreign government. Like the French spoliation claims, they were referred by act of Congress to a domestic tribunal sitting under the authority of the laws of the United States, by which tribunal these claims were passed upon as international claims, depending upon rules of international law, although the judgment was to be paid by the United States.

I will take up first the questions of the allowance to the owner of the ship or cargo of the premium of insurance paid by him. The syllabus of the case in which this point was decided——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator permit me a question right there?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Was not the amount of the Alabama award amply sufficient to cover all the items to which the Senator is addressing himself—that is, the lump sum?

Mr. LODGE. It was more than sufficient; but I do not think that has any bearing on the merits of the cases or the principles on which that money was awarded under the Geneva arbitration, which was provided for by the treaty of Washington. Fifteen and a half million dollars, as I recall it, was paid to the United States and was in the Treasury of the United States, and it was just as much the money of the United States as anything else in the Treasury. Then the claimants came forward with their claims, which, of course, were against that fund, but the rules on which those claims were decided are precisely the same, it seems to me, as those relating to any other claims. The fact that the United States had money especially paid to it by a foreign government to meet the claims does not seem to me to touch the case. In the case of the French spoliation claims the United States received in consideration of assuming the payment of the French spoliation claims indemnity, or they were relieved from the payment of the claims against them. They took up these claims because the claims of their citizens were used as a set-off to the claims of the citizens of France.

As I was saying, the syllabus of the case in which this point was decided, that of Hubbell against United States, contained in Moore's International Arbitrations, an official work published by authority of the United States at the Government Printing Office, volume 4, page 4242, is as follows:

The measure of damage for goods destroyed by the Confederate cruisers is the value of the goods at the place and time of shipment, with charges and marine insurance actually paid, with interest on the aggregate so produced from the time of shipment till the date of destruction, at 6 per cent.

In support of this ruling the court said (pp. 4255, 4256):

From the earliest period in our judicial history actions have been brought by the owners of goods against persons other than the parties to the contract of affreightment, growing out of torts committed against the goods while in transit on their way from the port of lading to an intended port of discharge.

The earliest of these which reached the Supreme Court of the United States was in 1794. (Del Col v. Arnold, 3 Dall., 333.)

This was a case of a vessel wrongfully captured by the commander of the Constellation, an American vessel of war, and brought into the port of Philadelphia, where the captain instituted proceedings for her condemnation. Pending these proceedings the cargo was sold, and the consul of Denmark intervened in the cause, claiming the vessel and cargo as the property of a Danish subject. The cause was heard by the Supreme Court upon appeal, and Chief Justice Marshall gave the opinion of the court, wherein they fixed the standard of damages by directing in their decree "that the cause be remanded to the circuit court with directions to refer it to commissioners to ascertain the damages sustained by the claimants, * * * and that the commissioners be instructed to take the actual prime cost of the cargo and vessel, with interest thereon, including the insurance actually paid, and such expenses as were necessarily sustained in consequence of bringing the vessel into the United States, as the standard by which damages ought to be measured."

A large sum was awarded against Capt. Murray in pursuance of this decree, which he was obliged to pay, and which was afterwards reimbursed to him by act of Congress from the Treasury of the United States. (Act Jan. 31, 1805.)

The rule of damages thus established has been followed from that day to the present through a series of decisions entirely unbroken and unchanged. (The Charming Betsey, 2 Cr., 64; Maley v. Shattuck, 3 Cr., 458 (1806); the schooner Lively and cargo, 1 Gallison, 315 (1812); the Anna Maria, 2 Wheat., 327 (1817); the Amiable Nancy, 3 Wheat., 546 (1818); L'Amistad de Rues, 5 Wheat., 385 (1820).)

The same rule was applied in the case of an unlawful and unjustifiable seizure of a vessel by the officers of the revenue in 1824. (The Apollon, 9 Wheat., 362.)

These were cases, of course, against our own Government.

From this statement it will be observed that the Alabama Claims Tribunal in every case allowed a premium of insurance in addition to the original prime cost of the cargo and vessel.

The rule as to freight is stated in an opinion of the court which is peculiarly instructive in view of the fact that the act constituting the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims prohibited it from allowing "unearned freight" as well as "gross freights."

Mr. Hackett, in his able work entitled "The Geneva Award Acts" (p. 50), thus quotes this opinion, the reasoning of which he terms "eminently satisfactory":

What are "unearned freights," as employed in the act? What do these terms, so unusual in the language of judges, shippers, carriers, and underwriters, require us to exclude? By forbidding the allowance of unearned freights it was certainly not intended to allow only freights fully earned. Freight is fully earned, in the judicial as well as popular sense, when the vessel has reached her port of destination and the cargo has been delivered; a place in which she would not be in much danger of destruction at the hands of an insurgent cruiser. If so destroyed, the question of freight could not have arisen at all, for her charterers would then have been her debtors, and the value of the vessel only would have been lost to her owners. It is impossible to suppose that Congress could have put so frivolous a thing into a serious statute. It is just as clear that freights wholly unearned could not have been intended; that is, where no expenses had been incurred, no stores supplied, no cargo taken on board, nothing done by shipper or owner toward the commencement of a voyage. Here, again, the vessel would have been found in her dock and out of the reach of the losses of which the statute treats. Even if she were not, her case is effectually provided for by forbidding any allowance for prospective freights. The provision respecting "unearned freights" was evidently intended to embrace something different from that of the inhibition of prospective gains, and to have some practical effect on the distribution of the money in hand. Let it observed, then, that between these extremes—of freight wholly earned and freight wholly unearned—there is an ample territory in which judicial investigation has gone on from the dawn of commerce to the present hour, and the results are found along the whole track of the commercial law. A ship is made ready for sea, a charter party more or less formal is executed, her cargo is shipped, and she starts on her voyage. She has not then earned her freight, and on the shipper or charterer she has no legal claim until after the lapse of many months and the endurance of many perils. But her owner has spent time and labor in fitting her out, has supplied the necessary stores, advanced the wages of the crew, and subjected her to the largest risk to which property is ever subjected or paid to others the required compensation for assuming such risk. Can it be maintained that her freight is unearned in the large and general sense in which this term is used in the statute—unearned, without qualification—wholly unearned? Can it be denied that some part of it has been earned? Not as against the shipper, if he has done nothing to change the contract, but even as against him if he has interrupted the voyage, and certainly as against everyone who willfully or carelessly stops her progress. Here the decisions, European and American, have a uniformity scarcely to be met with in any other department of the law. (Rep., 84.)

This shows that freight was always allowed by the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims on precisely the same principles as were adopted by the Court of Claims in these very cases involving French spoliations, and that the same is true in regard to premiums of insurance.

But the Alabama claims were not the only claims for seizure of ships that arose out of the Civil War. In addition to our grievances against Great Britain, her citizens had theirs against us. A large number of British vessels with their cargoes were seized by vessels of the United States Navy during the Civil War on the charge either of attempting to break the blockade of the southern coast or of carrying contraband to the Confederates.

These vessels were libeled before our admiralty courts. Some of them were condemned; others released without any damages for detention or loss of freight. In all such cases the British owners preferred claims before the Mixed Commission appointed under the treaty of 1871 for the value of the vessels and cargoes with all incidental damages where they were condemned and taken away or where the vessel and cargo were restored for incidental damages.

In the case of the Sir William Peel (5 Wall., 517), a ship and cargo were stopped on their way to Matamoros, Mexico, at the mouth of the Rio Grande and libeled as prize of war on the charges both of attempting to break the blockade and of carrying contraband. The Supreme Court of the United States held that neither charge was established and ordered the restitution of the vessel and cargo, although without costs to either party on the ground that there was some probable cause justifying the seizure.

If the theory which seems to underlie the analysis of these findings made by the Committee on Claims is sound—that the mere value of the vessel and cargo represents the "actual property loss" (see report, p. 416)—the case should have ended there, and they would have become entitled to nothing more; that is, the case of the Sir William Peel should have ended with the decision of the Supreme Court.

Before the Mixed Commission, however, under the British treaty of 1871, they made claim for the damages attending their detention and loss of market, and that commission allowed them the enormous sum of $272,920 for these incidental damages after the Supreme Court had by its judgment restored the whole of their vessel and cargo to them. See Report of Her Majesty's Agent of the Proceedings and Awards of the Mixed Commission on British and American Claims, published at London, 1874, pages 107 to 113, where the entire history of this case is given.

In the case of the Circassian (2 Wall., 135) a British vessel was condemned by the Supreme Court of the United States with her cargo as lawful prize, affirming in this respect the decree of the district court below. The owners of the vessel and cargo and her insurers then presented a claim before the Mixed Commission under the treaty of 1871 for the value of the vessel and cargo, as well as for her freight. One claim made before that commission, that of Overend Gurney & Co., was for the freight and nothing else. On this item of the freight for the voyage that claimant was allowed $20,540. (Report of Her Majesty's Agent of the Proceedings and Awards of the Mixed Commission on British and American Claims, published at London, 1874, pp. 124, 132.)

Insurance losses were allowed on the same vessel amounting to $133,296, without anything being said as to deduction of premiums paid for the insurance.

In the course of some of the remarks on these Matamoros cases, as they are called, in this report on the Mixed Commission of 1871, pages 106, 107, it is said:

Reference was made to several cases before the commission under the treaty of 1794, in which it was said that the commissioners, as indemnity for captures held to have been unlawfully made, allowed not merely the value of cargoes, but net profits which would have been received if the cargoes had reached their port of destination, and which in some cases amounted to nearly 100 per cent.

These decisions of that commission fully show that what they allowed in cases of wrongful capture of British vessels by United States vessels was not the mere net value of the vessel and her cargo, but also included other damages directly sustained by the party, prominent among which was the loss of freight.

THE CHINESE INDEMNITY.

An examination of the decision of the Court of Claims in the claims against the Chinese indemnity fund in 1880 (15 C. Cls., 546, affirmed by the Supreme Court, 16 C. Cls., 635) shows (p. 576) that insurers recovered against this fund the full amount of the losses as paid by them, without any deduction for premiums of insurance.

BERING SEA CLAIMS AGAINST RUSSIA.

In 1902 there was an arbitration at The Hague of claims of certain American vessels unlawfully captured by Russia in the Russian part of Bering Sea on charges of illegal sealing. The arbitrator was Mr. T. M. C. Asser, counselor to the minister of foreign affairs of the Kingdom of Netherlands. His decisions are found in the report of the counsel for the United States (printed as Appendix I to the Foreign Relations of the United States for 1902).

He allowed in all cases, in addition to the value of the property, damages for "loss of catch."

That is, the possible catch of fish on the fishing voyage, which comes very near allowing possible profit. This was, under the circumstances under which those claims arose, the equivalent not merely of freight in other cases, but of loss of profits in addition. He stated in the judgment the following reasons for making this allowance (Foreign Relations, Appendix I, p. 453):

Considering that the general principle of civil law, according to which the damages should include an indemnity not only for the loss suffered, but also for the profit of which one has been deprived, is equally applicable to international litigation, and that in order to apply it it is not necessary that the amount of the profit of which one is deprived should be exactly determined, but that it suffices to show that in the natural order of things one would be able to realize a profit of which one is deprived by the act which gives rise to the claim.

That is the decision of a foreign subject, of which we took full advantage. This rule is more liberal than any that has been applied by the Court of Claims in these cases.

I now want to take up the decisions of the Supreme Court.

In the case of Murray v. Schooner Charming Betsey (2 Cr., 64), where a vessel was improperly captured by a United States public armed vessel, the court thus laid down (pp. 125, 126) the rule for the ascertainment of damages, the opinion being by Chief Justice Marshall:

That the said commissioners be instructed to take the actual prime cost of the cargo and vessel, with interest thereon, including the insurance actually paid, and such expenses as were necessarily sustained in consequence of bringing the vessel into the United States as the standard by which the damages ought to be measured.

In Comegys v. Vasse (1 Pet., 195) the claim was made by an underwriter for the recovery from the insured of money which the insured had obtained through an award of the commission of 1819 on claims with Spain. The court, in the opinion by Mr. Justice Story, held that the underwriter was entitled to recover back all that he had paid, and made no deduction for any insurance premium. The court says (p. 214):

The underwriter, then, stands in the place of the insured and becomes legally entitled to all that can be rescued from destruction.

And observe that no deduction was made of the premium.

Citing a New York decision made in the case of one of the insurers on a vessel captured by the French, the opinion says (p. 215):

The case of Gracie v. The New York Insurance Co. (8 Johns., 237) recognizes the same principle in its full extent. That was a case of abandonment after a capture and where there had been a final condemnation, not only by the courts in France, but an express confirmation of the condemnation by the sovereign himself. One question was whether the jury were at liberty to deduct from the total loss the value of the spes recuperandi. The court held that they were not. Mr. Chief Justice Kent, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "If France should at any future period agree to and actually make compensation for the capture and condemnation in question, the Government of the United States, to whom the compensation would in the first instance be payable, would become trustee for the party having the equitable title to the reimbursement; and this would clearly be the defendants (the underwriters), if they should pay the amount," etc.

This case recognizes to the fullest extent the right of the underwriter to recover the entire amount paid by him.

In the case of the Baltimore (8 Wall., 377, 386) the Supreme Court laid down the rule as to damage where the voyage is broken up by the act of a wrongdoer in the following terms:

Restitution or compensation is the rule in all cases where repairs are practicable, but if the vessel of the libellants is totally lost, the rule of damage is the market value of the vessel (if the vessel is of a class which has such value) at the time of her destruction.

Allowance for freight is made in such a case, reckoning the gross freight less the charges which would necessarily have been incurred in earning the same and which were saved to the owner by the accident, together with interest on the same from the date of the probable termination of voyage.

The point is also well stated by the circuit court of appeals in Mason v. Marine Insurance Co. (110 Fed. Rep., 752, 754; Lawyers' Repts. Annotated, 700, 704, 705):

The earning power of the vessel was an incident inhering in her ownership.

In Hall & Long v. Railroad Companies (13 Wall., 367) the Supreme Court allowed a recovery by an insurer using the name of the shipper against the railroad companies which were responsible for the loss of the goods. The full amount of the insurance was thus allowed to be recovered. The very point was made in argument in that case (p. 367) that:

In equity the insurance company could have no claim to subrogation until it had fully reimbursed the merchant, not merely the actual losses but the premiums previously paid.

Also that the insurer "has been fully paid for the risk it has assumed."

The court, however, overruled these arguments and held in the opinion (p. 373):

That an underwriter who has paid a loss is entitled to recover what he has paid by a suit in the name of the assured against the carrier who caused the loss.

Thus the Supreme Court of the United States has recognized the justice in principle of all these classes of items in cases which have come before it.

It is my belief, Mr. President, that the Court of Claims in the allowance of freight and premiums of insurance to those who lost vessels and cargoes, as well as in its allowance to underwriters of the full amount paid them for the losses without deductions of the premiums, was simply following its unbroken precedents, only a few of which I have read, but all of which I have cited. If it had done otherwise, it would have violated such precedents and would have established a new rule.

Mr. President, I have a few pages more; it will not take me long to conclude, but I can not conclude in the three minutes which remain before the beginning of the impeachment case. I should therefore like to stop at this point.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I desire to state that at the close of the morning business to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to resume the consideration of this bill, and at the conclusion of the Senator's remarks, unless there is to be some further discussion of the amendment, I shall then ask the Senate to vote upon the pending amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, and also upon his amendment.

Mr. LODGE. That is perfectly agreeable to me.

INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF LIQUOR.

Mr. SANDERS. I ask unanimous consent that on Monday, January 20, at 3 o'clock p. m., the bill (S. 4043) to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors be taken up for consideration, and that the vote be taken on all amendments pending and amendments to be offered, and upon the bill itself, not later than the hour of 6 o'clock on that day.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee makes a request for unanimous consent——

Mr. SANDERS. I might say, in this connection, that this is one week later than the request made yesterday, and will give ample time for debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the request.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Monday, January 20, at 3 o'clock p. m., the bill (S. 4043) to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors be taken up for consideration, and that the vote be taken on all amendments pending and amendments to be offered, and upon the bill itself, not later than the hour of 6 o'clock on that day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I shall have to object to that proposed unanimous-consent agreement and other unanimous-consent agreements proposed to be made at this time in the session, unless they are made subject to appropriation bills. All the great supply bills are yet to pass; the time is short in which they may be acted upon; and, I repeat, I shall have to object to such unanimous-consent agreements on that account.

Mr. SANDERS. I should like to inquire if the Senator would not be willing to agree to the proposition if appropriation bills are excepted?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that, so far as my objection in that line goes, it would be perfectly agreeable to except the appropriation bills. I hardly think, however, the Senator from Tennessee ought to ask a unanimous-consent agreement in so thin a Senate as we now have; but my objection is entirely because of the condition of the appropriation bills. I shall ask that any unanimous-consent agreements shall except appropriation bills, which should have the right of way.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not desire to object to the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, but there are a number of Senators who, I know, desire to discuss the bill to which he refers, and I do not think an agreement of that kind ought to be made without the presence of those Senators. I therefore make the point that no quorum is present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of no quorum is made, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there any inaccuracies in the Journal? If not, it will stand approved. The managers on the part of the House will proceed with their examination of the witness.

Cross-examination:

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) Judge Archbald, I think you stated that the first connection you had with the Katydid culm dump was when Mr. Williams came to see you on the 31st day of March, 1911?—A. I did not fix that date. I said that the matter was brought to my attention first by Mr. Williams.

Q. It was on that date, was it not?—A. That it was first brought to my attention?

Q. Yes.—A. No.

Q. When was it first brought to your attention?—A. I could not fix the date, but it was some little time prior to that.

Q. Was it not the day that you wrote a letter to Mr. May inquiring if it was for sale and the price of it?—A. Not at all.

Q. When did you write that letter?—A. I wrote it the day it is dated.

Q. When was that, with reference to the first time that Mr. Williams talked to you about this dump?—A. The exact length of time I can not give, but I should say it may have been two or three weeks after his first speaking of it.

Q. Your first connection with it, then, was some time in March, 1911?—A. I should think so, although I would not be positive about it. It may have been as early as February.

Q. I wish you would state now the substance of the conversation you had with Mr. Williams when he first came to see you.—A. I have had so many conversations with Mr. Williams on this subject that it would be very difficult for me to state what occurred the first time he mentioned it, but I will try to give it the best I can.

My remembrance is he said the Katydid culm dump could be obtained and was for sale, and that some money could be made out of it, and that he spoke of the fact that Mr. Robertson laid claim to it, and that an option could be obtained from Mr. Robertson, and that if an option could also be obtained for the interests of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. then the matter would be in shape for disposition.

Q. What did you say in reply to that?—A. I do not think at first I said very much in regard to it. I have heard a good many things and statements by Mr. Williams——

Q. Well, Judge, just confine yourself to answering my question.—A. I could not tell you what I said in regard to it.

Q. You say now you do not know what reply you made to Mr. Williams?—A. No; I do not.

Q. Have you stated all that Mr. Williams said?—A. All that I remember as to that first or initial conversation.

Q. What was the purpose of Mr. Williams in coming to you with reference to the matter?—A. I could not tell you his mental purpose.

Q. What did he say was the reason he came to you?—A. He did not say why he came to me, that I remember.

Q. From what he said, what did you understand was his purpose in coming to you?—A. I should say that his idea was to have me assist him in carrying out a transaction of that kind—a purchase of the double interests in the Katydid culm dump and subsequently to dispose of the culm dump at a profit.

Q. In what way did he expect you to assist him?—A. I do not know.

Q. Did you assist him?—A. I did.

Q. In what way did he ask you to assist him; what did he ask you to do?—A. Well, your last question does refresh my memory. Either at that time or at a later time, before that letter was written, he told me that he had secured a verbal option from Mr. Robertson with regard to the interest he had in the matter, and that it only remained to secure an option on the interest of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., and then it would be complete, and he wanted me to see whether that could be obtained from Capt. May.

Q. Then you do know that his purpose was to get you to intercede with the coal company and the railroad company for their interest in this property?—A. I would not adopt your words.

Q. State it in your own words, Judge.—A. He desired me to see whether an option could be obtained upon the interest of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. in that dump. He further stated that Capt. May was under obligations to him, and he thought that Capt. May would look favorably upon it. My remembrance—it is somewhat indistinct, but still I have a faint remembrance—is that the first suggestion on his part was a letter of introduction to Capt. May.

Q. Did he say that he had been to Capt. May?—A. He did not.

Q. You knew that he had not been to Capt. May, did you not?—A. Knew that he had or had not?

Q. Yes.—A. I do not know whether he had or had not, but I think he had not.

Q. What reply did you make to him when he told you that he would like a letter of introduction to Capt. May?—A. I can not give exactly the words with regard to it.

Q. Give the substance of what you said.—A. My impression is that prior to the letter which I did eventually give him I had a conversation over the telephone with Capt. May about the matter, asking whether it was possible that the interest of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. could be obtained.

Q. You did not give him any letter of introduction?—A. No, sir; I did not.

Q. What reason did you give Mr. Williams for not giving him merely a letter of introduction?—A. I do not think I gave him any reason, and I am not sure that that was the case; but I just have a faint remembrance on that point. When the letter which is now in evidence here was produced before the Judiciary Committee I expected the form of it would be a letter of introduction. I was very much surprised when I found it was couched in the terms in which is was couched.

Q. That is, you thought so up to the present time, until you saw it recently?—A. Not up to the present time; no.

Q. Well, up to the time of the investigation?—A. Up to the time of the hearing last May before the Judiciary Committee.

Q. The letter you refer to is the one dated March 31, in which you simply inquire of Capt. May if their interest in the Katydid dump can be purchased, and at what price. That is the letter you refer to?—A. I refer to the letter of March 31, which is not quite couched in the way you have stated.

Q. When you wrote that letter you understood you were a partner in the enterprise, did you not?—A. I understood not that I was a partner, but that I was participating in the matter.

Q. And that you were to share in the profits?—A. I assumed that I would share in the profits.

Q. When did you and Mr. Williams come to that agreement?—A. There was never any definite statement or any definite agreement in regard to it.

Q. Is it not true, Judge, that you declined to give him a letter of introduction——A. I do not remember that I did.

Q. Wait until I finish my question. [Continuing.] You declined to give him a letter of introduction until such time as he had suggested to you that he would share the profits with you?—A. Absolutely not——

Q. Now, wait. And, then, afterwards you wrote this letter inquiring about the possibility of buying it?—A. There is not a word of truth, if you will permit me, in that suggestion.

Q. How did it come that you declined Mr. Williams's request for a letter of introduction——A. I do not say that I declined his request——

Q. Let me finish my question. That you declined to give him that letter, but, on the other hand, wrote a letter over your own name inquiring if they would sell the dump and put a price on it?—A. I do not say that I ever declined to give him a letter of introduction. I do not remember that I ever did decline.

Q. But when you wrote that letter you understood you were to share in the profits?—A. I certainly did.

Q. When did you come to that understanding?—A. Simply by reason of the conversation or the conversations I had with Mr. Williams, because he stated that if these conflicting interests were obtained the dump could probably be sold at a profit, and he mentioned several concerns that he thought would be likely to be interested in purchasing. That was one of the first things I asked him about.

Q. How did he say that; did he say "We can sell it at a profit"?—A. I do not remember.

Q. Or did he say, "If you will assist me I will share the profits with you"?—A. He never said anything of the kind.

Q. But you inferred from all the talks you had that he proposed to give you a part of the profits?—A. I did.

Q. And when you came to that conclusion or understanding with Mr. Williams, then you wrote this letter inquiring if they would sell it and the price of it?—A. No; that is not so.

Q. Well, you did not write the letter until you had come to that conclusion, did you? You knew at that time that you were to share in the profits?—A. Yes; I assume that I knew at that time that I was to share in the profits.

Q. And you gathered from Mr. Williams's conversation that what he wanted you to do was to intercede with Mr. May, the superintendent of the Hillside Co., for their interest in this dump?—A. No, sir.

Q. Well, what else did he ask you to do?—A. There was no question of intercession or interceding.

Q. What did he call it?—A. He did not use that word.

Q. What did he call it, Judge?—A. I can not give you the exact word. It was simply that an effort was to be made to secure the interest of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., an option on that——

Q. Why do you object to the word "interceding"?—A. Because it carries a meaning that I do not think is in the case.

Q. Do you say, Judge, that what you did was not simply interceding with this company to get this dump?—A. It certainly was not.

Q. When you telephoned Capt. May what did he say to you?—A. That is rather indefinite in my mind.

Q. What did you say to him?—A. I will give you my best impression about it: I asked him whether the company had an interest in the Katydid culm dump and whether it was for disposition, and my remembrance of his answer is that the situation there was somewhat peculiar and he could hardly say whether they would dispose of it or not. And I think in that connection, although I would not be sure whether that occurred before the writing of the letter or whether it occurred afterwards, he further said, either at one time or the other, that Mr. Richardson was to be in Scranton and that he would bring the matter up to him.

Q. He asked you to write the letter, did he not?—A. Capt. May ask me to write the letter?

Q. Yes; he asked you to write the letter, did he not?—A. No; I do not remember that.

Q. He did not?—A. I do not remember——

Q. Before this had occurred, however, you had inquired of Mr. Williams if he thought he could sell the dump?—A. Yes, sir; I had.

Q. And he thought that Mr. Boland could find a purchaser?—A. He spoke of Mr. Boland possibly finding a purchaser; yes.

Q. Had you seen the dump before that time?—A. I never saw the dump until the last of August, 1912.

Q. You did not go to see it until——A. No, sir.

Q. Why did you not go to see it before you undertook to buy it, Judge?—A. I do not know. I was busy in other matters. I simply did not go. I thought I knew where it was. I found afterwards when I came to see it actually that I was mistaken.

Q. If you had seen it could you have formed some estimate of its value?—A. I do not believe I could.

Q. You were not experienced in coal dumps?—A. I certainly am not; no, sir.

Q. You would not know how to go about it to make an estimate of the coal in a dump?—A. I would not.

Q. So you simply took Mr. Williams's word for that?—A. I did; that is, in part.

Q. After you had written to Capt. May and he had failed to answer your letter for some time you called him up by telephone?—A. Well, I say I can not tell you about that. After I wrote that letter my remembrance is that I saw Capt. May once or twice. As I testified yesterday, I not infrequently met him on the street, and I spoke about the matter to him. I think also very possibly I called him up once by telephone and asked about it.

Q. About how many times did you talk with him between the time you wrote the letter and the time you went to New York?—A. Oh, I should say three or four times.

Q. And he invariably told you that he did not know about the matter yet; that he did not know whether they would sell it or not, and also suggested to you that it had not been the practice of the railroad company to sell its coal properties, did he not?—A. You put two questions in one, and I can only answer one at a time. I will answer either of them.

Q. Answer them in succession.—A. I will have to ask to have the question repeated, the first and last half.

The Reporter read the question.

The WITNESS. He said nothing whatever in regard to the practice of the company about selling their culm dumps, and, on the contrary, I knew somewhat differently. He did say whenever I spoke to him about it, as I remember, that the matter had not yet been decided.

Q. Do you remember when Mr. Williams came to your office and told you that Capt. May had seen Mr. Richardson and that Mr. Richardson had advised against selling the dump?—A. Mr. Williams never told me that.

Q. Did he ever tell you that Capt. May had told him that he had seen Mr. Richardson?—A. He never did.

Q. Did he tell you that Mr. May would not talk to him about it?—A. He never did.

Q. What did he tell you about what had occurred, when he had been to see Capt. May?—A. He went to see Capt. May, as I understand, only once. That was when he presented that letter. Capt. May at first wanted to ask him a larger price than he, Williams, thought it was worth, and they finally arrived at the price which was named.

Q. On the day of the letter?—A. Yes.

Q. The 31st of March?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you say that they then agreed on the price of $4,500?—A. I so understood. That was the report made to me by Mr. Williams.

Q. Do you not know that in September, when he went there to get the option, they discussed——A. Oh, I beg your pardon; it was in September.

Q. On the 31st of March they did not discuss the price at all?—A. That is true.

Q. What, if anything, did Mr. Williams tell you Capt. May had said to him?—A. I can not remember about that. When he came back about that date, I can not remember what he said.

Q. Do you not remember whether he said that Capt. May said that you could have it or could not have it?—A. He certainly did not say that Capt. May said they could have it.

Q. Do you remember his coming back and seeing you in regard to it?—A. I remember his coming to tell me that he had presented that letter.

Q. While you were waiting for a reply from Capt. May, Mr. Williams came to see you quite frequently?—A. He came to see me several times, yes, while I was at my office in Scranton.

Q. And to see you about this matter?—A. Yes.

Q. To have you further urge Capt. May to answer your letter?—A. He was anxious to have the matter closed. He spoke about Mr. Robertson being anxious, too, and that Mr. Robertson was rather restive about it.

Q. And finally you told him that you were going to see Mr. Brownell?—A. I finally—I think I said that; yes.

Q. And you told him you would go to New York and see Mr. Brownell?—A. I told him I would see Mr. Brownell while I was in New York on other business.

Q. I think you said yesterday that you did not remember any conversation with Mr. Williams at that time about the Lighterage case?—A. I do not remember ever having spoken of the Lighterage case to Mr. Williams.

Q. You did have the briefs and the petitions——A. Well, I had the record.

Q. And the records in cases 38 and 39 on your desk in your office in Scranton in the month of June, did you not?—A. I think I did; but I had the briefs and the record tied up and in separate packages by themselves either upon my desk or upon my mantel where I kept——

Q. Tied up in what way?—A. I think tied up in red tape.

Q. Did they have a wrapper around them?—A. No.

Q. They were lying there on your desk where anyone in your office could see them?—A. Either upon my desk or on my mantel.

Q. There was not anything on any printed matter connected with those cases in which the word "lighterage" appeared?—A. No.

Q. Do you know how Mr. Williams learned that you were considering the Lighterage case if you did not tell him?—A. I do not know; I could make a guess——

Q. Wait, now. If you did not tell him, do you know how he learned you were considering the Lighterage case?—A. I could only guess.

Q. You will not say that you did not talk with him about the Lighterage case?—A. I have no remembrance about talking with him. I think I would remember it if I had talked with him.

Q. Do you remember his asking you what "lighterage" meant——A. I do not.

Q. And that you explained to him that it related to tugboats at New York.—A. I do not remember anything of the kind.

Q. You did go to New York to see Mr. Brownell?—A. I saw Mr. Brownell when I was in New York.

Q. That was on the 4th of August?—A. It was.

Q. You said yesterday that you said to Mr. Brownell, or gave as your reason for coming to see him, that you wanted to talk to him about the title to the Katydid culm dump.—A. Not necessarily that.

Q. What did you say?—A. I told him I understood that the question of the title or the conflict of title between Robertson & Law or Mr. Robertson and the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. had not only been passed upon by their local attorneys, Judge Willard, of Willard, Warren & Knapp, but also had been referred to him as the counsel of the company in New York.

Q. What else did you say to him about it?—A. I told him that I was seeking to get both those options, and that a tentative arrangement had been made with Mr. Robertson by which he had agreed to sell for a certain figure, and if the title of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. could be obtained that that would complete the title, and the matter could be disposed of, and there would be no question as to a conflict or diversity as to whether it was owned by all or who owned it.

Q. Were you concerned in getting the controversy disposed of that might arise between Robertson & Law and the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. or were you interested in getting the title in yourself?—A. I was not concerned in settling the controversy between Robertson & Law and the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. I was concerned in trying to buy the dump.

Q. That is what you went there for, is it not?—A. It certainly is.

Q. And you told Mr. Brownell that you wanted to buy it?—A. I do not remember that I said so in that way.

Q. The conversation you had with him about the title was merely incidental, was it not, to your main purpose?—A. It was introductory.

Q. To your purpose?—A. Yes.

Q. And he referred you to Mr. Richardson?—A. He told me that Mr. Richardson was the person to see.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I wish to ask a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas will send it to the desk.

Mr. CULBERSON. There are two questions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas sends to the desk two questions to be propounded to the witness. They will be propounded one at a time in the order of their number.

The Secretary read as follows:

Who, as between you and Williams, introduced the subject of the Lighterage case?

The WITNESS. I do not remember that I ever talked with Mr. Williams about the Lighterage case. I have no memory that I ever did.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the second question.

The Secretary read as follows:

State fully the conversation on this subject.

The WITNESS. I can not state the conversation because I do not remember any.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The manager will proceed.

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) After you had talked with Mr. Richardson, which was the 4th of August, you met Mr. May on the streets of Scranton?—A. About three weeks later.

Q. That was the 29th of August?—A. I have not the means by me to fix that date exactly.

Q. He told you to tell Mr. Williams to come around and he would give him the option?—A. That in substance.

Q. Do you know why he told you to have Mr. Williams come around?—A. I do not know why he said it in that way.

Q. Did you suggest to him you were the one who wanted the option?—A. I did not in that conversation.

Q. Do you know why the letter giving the option was addressed only to Williams and not to you and Williams?—A. I do not.

Q. He brought you the option when he received it, did he not?—A. He brought back the option after he had obtained it from Capt. May in the form in which it appears.

Q. When you got that you considered that you and Mr. Williams had an option on the entire title of this dump, excepting the Everhart and Brooke Land Co.'s interests, did you?—A. I understood that the paper that Capt. May had given and the subsequent paper that was secured from Mr. Robertson practically controlled the title of the dump.

Q. Up to the time you got the option of the Hillside Co, you have related all you did in connection with the matter——A. All——

Q. Wait. Let me finish. That is, your conversation and your letters to Mr. May and your visit to Brownell and Richardson, the officials of the Erie Railroad Co., in New York? That is all you had done in connection with the matter up to that time?—A. That is all that I remember. Of course, you did not ask me with regard to what happened with Mr. Richardson in New York.

Q. No.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I propound a question to the witness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas sends to the desk a question which he desires propounded to the witness, and it will be read to him by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Why did you say awhile ago that you knew how Williams came to think of the Lighterage case? State fully.

The WITNESS. I do not think that I have said that I knew how Mr. Williams came to know of the Lighterage case. I said I might make a guess.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is what I want, Mr. President.

The WITNESS. I am perfectly willing to make the guess, if the Chair says that I can.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) Make a guess, Judge. Go on.—A. In one of two ways: He either got that information from Mr. Boland, which seems to me most likely, or he may have heard me speaking of the Lighterage case to others in my office, not to him.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to have that developed.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I will do so, Senator. [To the witness:] Who had you talked to in your office about the Lighterage case in the presence of Williams?—A. I can not tell you.

Q. Do you recall any occasion when you talked about the Lighterage case to anyone in your office, regardless of whether or not Williams was present?—A. I do not recall distinctly talking to anyone about the Lighterage case, but the Lighterage case was made a subject of considerable newspaper comment. It was quite an interesting case. It was one of the first cases that had been argued before the Commerce Court and one of the first cases that we had tentatively decided. It involved nice questions. My remembrance is that I did state to some lawyers who were present in my office at one time or another the points that were involved in that case.

Q. Can you name any of the lawyers you talked with about it?—A. I can not.

Q. So, at the present time, you would not say that you did talk to anybody in the presence of Williams about the Lighterage case?—A. I can not remember that I did.

Q. Now, how did William P. Boland know about the Lighterage case?—A. I can not tell you.

Q. Do you know whether he knew anything about the Lighterage case or not?—A. I could not know, with one exception.

Q. Well, what is it?—A. In the notes of Miss Mary Boland, which she took, there is a mention, I believe along in September, of the Lighterage case.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I should like to put a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California sends to the desk a question which he desires propounded to the witness, and it will be read to him by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Did it occur to your own mind at any time during the pendency of these negotiations that your official position might have weight in inducing May or other officers of the company to come to satisfactory terms?

The WITNESS. I had no idea of that, and I would like to explain, if I may. When dealing with Capt. May, so far as I was dealing with him, I was dealing with a man who had known me for a great number of years, and whom I had known. I knew him so well that I knew my position would have no influence upon the matter. I presented the matter to him simply as a business proposition and expected him to treat it in that way, and only in that way. I knew that the matter was finally to be disposed of by Capt. May.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I send to the desk a question to be asked.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska sends to the desk a question to be propounded to the witness, which will be read to him by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

What was the reason for thinking that you would be more successful than Williams in inducing the company to give an option on the Katydid dump?

The WITNESS. I think my position in the community is a little different from that of Mr. Williams, and that I would be more likely to secure it than he could. That is entirely distinct from my judicial position or my position as a judge of the Commerce Court at that time.

Q. (By Mr. STERLING.) Do you know whether Mr. Williams——

Mr. CULBERSON. May I ask another question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas will send it to the desk. [After a pause.] The Senator from Texas sends to the desk two questions, which will be propounded in the order in which they are numbered.

The Secretary read as follows:

When Williams was in your office, was the docket of the court in your presence?

The WITNESS. There was no docket, if I may so say. There was what I have here—what I would call a calendar. It is among my papers there, and I would be very glad to produce it.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. It was marked and put in evidence yesterday.

Mr. MARTIN. It was handed to the Secretary yesterday.

The WITNESS. It is a green-covered book of the character of the one I hold in my hand. That is the only docket. It is called a docket, but I should call it an argument list, using the phraseology we are accustomed to in Pennsylvania, or a calendar. That was prepared for the court, and as we met in October it was in my hands probably some time about the middle of September; and on that list——

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the second question be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The second question sent to the desk by the Senator from Texas will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

State fully the cases in the docket and if the Lighterage case was shown by it.

The WITNESS. On that document, or argument list, on page 12 and No. 38, appears the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., petitioners, the Brooklyn Eastern District Terminal, John Arbuckle, and William A. Jamison, intervening petitioners, against the United States, as respondent, by the Interstate Commerce Commission, Federal Sugar Refining Co., intervening respondents. That is the so-called Lighterage case, spoken of sometimes as the Sugar Refinery case. On the opposite page to that there appears this, after giving the date of filing in the Commerce Court:

To set aside an order of Interstate Commerce Commission affecting lighterage charges on sugar in and near New York Harbor.

That appears on that, but I venture to say that it is in rather an obscure position, and a person would have to know where he was hunting and what he was looking for to find it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Unless it be shown to him.

The WITNESS. Yes, sir; unless it be shown to him.

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) Now, that docket did not come to your table until the 15th of September?—A. I do not know just what time in September.

Q. You know now, do you not, that Williams knew something about the Lighterage case before that?—A. I do not know that he did.

Q. Do you not know that the notes taken by Mary Boland on the 5th day of September, 10 days before you got that, gave the substance of a conversation which Williams had with Boland, where he told you about the Lighterage case?—A. I do not know the date of Mary Boland's notes. I do not know the date when that docket was in my hands in September.

Q. You say about September 15.—A. I do not.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I certainly think the manager does not want to mislead anybody. Those notes are in evidence and the dates appear, the 18th and the 28th of September. They are in evidence.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I should like to suggest to counsel that he will not take that for granted. It is not my purpose to mislead anybody.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I so stated.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I object now to counsel interfering in this examination, because he can correct any of the mistakes I make when I am through. [To the witness:] You think perhaps Williams got his idea about the Lighterage case from Boland?—A. I say that is one of the guesses which I would make with regard to it.

Q. Do you base it on the fact that there is something in Miss Boland's notes about the Lighterage case?—A. In part; yes.

Q. The notes purport to be a statement made by Williams to Boland and not by Boland to Williams about the Lighterage case, do they not?—A. I will not say what those notes purport to state.

Q. So if the notes indicate anything it is that Williams gave information to Boland instead of Boland giving information to Williams?—A. I pass no judgment on what the notes say.

Q. Assuming that that is the fact——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio desire to propound a question?

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to propound a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The manager will please suspend for a moment. The Senator from Ohio presents the following question, which will be propounded to the witness by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

If the fact that the difference in your and Williams's position in the community would give you more influence than Williams had in conducting negotiations with May and his corporation associates, did it not also occur to you that your judicial position would also help to influence them in that transaction?

The WITNESS. I should answer that no. I had no idea that my official position would enter into the question at all, by reason of what I have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The manager will proceed.

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) Williams was in your office two or three times a week from the 31st of March down during that summer, was he not?—A. I would not fix the number of times a week.

Q. How often?—A. He might have been there once a week.

Q. And sometimes oftener?—A. He might have; yes.

Q. Do you understand that May knew that you had a financial interest in this transaction?—A. I assumed that he did. That I had a financial interest in it?

Q. Yes, sir.—A. I assumed that he did.

Q. Did you invest any money in the enterprise?—A. I did not.

Q. Did you expect to, at any time?—A. I did not think it would be necessary.

Q. Your idea simply was to get an option and then sell it at a profit?—A. That is a very familiar way of dealing with matters up there.

Q. I am not asking about the custom.—A. That was my idea.

Q. So all you did was to intercede with May, Brownell, and Richardson for this dump?—A. I am not going to adopt that word.

Q. Do you say that you did something else?—A. I did not intercede with anybody.

Q. Oh, well, what word would satisfy you, Judge?—A. I will not suggest.

Q. Did you do anything then except writing letters and telephoning and making personal visits to these three officials of the company that owned this dump? Did you do anything else?—A. I think not. That is, I do not remember that I did, except when it came to the sale of the property, or the attempted sale of the property.

Q. When you sold it to Conn what did you do?—A. We had an agreement that I thought was going to be complete.

Q. And that failed by reason of the fact that Conn's attorneys would not accept the title?—A. They felt as——

Q. Just answer my question?—A. I can not.

Q. Well, did it fail by reason of the fact that they would not accept the title?—A. Yes; you may put it that way.

Q. Did they suggest to you anything new about the title, when you had the conference with them, that you had not known before?—A. The matter came out when we met in Judge Knapp's office—Judge Knapp, of Scranton, I am speaking of—the attorney for the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. I found that all that the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. would do would be simply to convey their interest, and I anticipated that they were going to sell not simply that but whatever right and title they had by reason of their operation of the Consolidated Breaker, and by virtue of the fact that they were joint owners or tenants in common in regard to that.

Q. At that time had you prepared the option for the sale to Conn?—A. No.

Q. When did you prepare that?—A. When we gathered at Judge Knapp's office?

Q. Yes.—A. Yes; I think I had.

Q. You had already prepared it and submitted it to Conn?—A. Yes; and Mr. Conn, I think——

Q. Did the contract which you prepared for Conn purport to warrant the title?—A. It did not.

Q. You were not intending to convey to Conn anything except what you got from the Hillside Co. and Robertson in that contract, were you?—A. I contemplated making a valid sale.

Q. Just answer my question.—A. I can not.

Q. Was the contract which you prepared for Conn, selling him this dump, of such a character as to warrant the title to him?—A. Yes; it was.

Q. All of the title?—A. Yes.

Q. Did it have any provisions in it about royalty to the Everharts?—A. It did.

Q. And the Brooke Land Co.?—A. The Everhart interest was practically included in that by general designation.

Q. The contract which you prepared for Conn covered all those interests, did it not?—A. I would not say that, because the contract it not before me. It is in writing.

Q. It covered it just as the option which May made to Williams covered it?—A. I can not tell you; I have not the contract before me.

Q. You remember that May provided in the option that it was subject to the royalty interests of these people?—A. He did not——

Q. Do you remember whether it said anything about that?—A. It said on all sizes above pea there would have to be royalty.

Q. That is what they had been paying on?—A. I do not know about that.

Q. And the contract which you prepared for Conn had the same provision?—A. It followed that same provision.

Q. So you were conveying to Conn just what you were getting from Mr. May, and you did not intend to convey anything else, did you?—A. I did not have anything else to convey, but I had a different idea of what I would be able to convey or what Mr. Williams and I had been able to convey after I had seen Judge Knapp.

Q. After that you went to Conn and asked for this contract, did you?—A. That was along in March.

Q. March, 1912?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Why did you do that?—A. Because I wanted to have the matter either go on, be concluded—that is to say, brought to an end—or——

Q. Was that after Scraggs had told you about the investigation in the Department of Justice?—A. Yes; it was.

Q. It was after that?—A. Yes.

Q. You stated yesterday that you wanted to take it up because you did not want to be a party to a contract where it would get the purchaser into a lawsuit. That was one of the reasons why you took up this contract from Conn?—A. I did not think that the property was in a shape or we had the title to it that would justify us in going on and making a sale.

Q. Then why, after that, did you make the option to John Henry Jones on the 6th of April?—A. Mr. John Henry Jones never had—you are referring to Mr. Thomas Starr Jones?

Q. I think that is right. You did that, did you not?—A. I did not make an option, and I think I explained yesterday how that option came about.

Q. You dictated the option?—A. Oh, I dictated the option.

Q. And Williams signed it in your presence?—A. He did.

Q. That was on the 6th of April, after you had taken up the Conn contract, in which you had given him an option for 10 days at $25,000?—A. Yes.

Q. Why, Judge, did not the consideration of the title affect you then, just the same as it affected you with reference to the Conn title?—A. I think I explained, or endeavored to explain, that yesterday in my examination in chief. The talk with Mr. Jones leading up to that option was that he was to take care of the outstanding interest in the Everharts, and that neither Mr. Williams nor myself would be responsible about that. He spoke of doing that at first by making a deposit of a certain proportion of the option price in case of sale in a bank for the benefit of the Everharts. After some consideration I did not agree to it, and finally the option was worded in the way it is worded, and it was limited to Mr. Williams, because the option only undertook to give him such a title as Mr. Williams had by virtue of the paper which he had from Capt. May and from Mr. Robertson.

Q. You do not mean to say that he was to give $25,000 for Williams's interest?—A. Such interest as I had.

Q. So it covered your interest just as much as though you had signed it?—A. Oh, yes.

Q. You say the reason you gave that option to Jones was because he agreed to take the title and take care of the Everharts and the Brooke Land Co.?—A. Yes, sir; because there was——

Q. Wait, now. That answers the question. The contract which was prepared for Mr. May provided that he should take care of those interests in the very same way, did it not?—A. The contract speaks for itself. I will not undertake to interpret it.

Q. Do you not think that the contract which you prepared for Conn made him responsible entirely for any claim that the Everharts and the Brooke Land Co. might make or have against this property?—A. I will not undertake to interpret the contract without seeing it.

Q. You do say that there was provision in there about their interests?—A. I do not bear in mind all the provisions of that contract.

Q. You know now, without looking at the contract, that you were not undertaking to warrant against any claims they might make, do you not?—A. I do not know that.

Q. You drew the contract?—A. I did.

Q. You spoke yesterday about this Robertson contract. Was that the one that was recorded?—A. Yes; the option from John M. Robertson to Mr. Williams.

Q. You say you did not record that?—A. I did not know anything about its being recorded.

Q. I understood you to say yesterday that it was acknowledged by the grantee, acknowledged by Mr. Williams, and put on record.—A. The grantor.

Q. By the grantee it was acknowledged?—A. I understood so.

Q. I presume the purpose of putting that acknowledgment on there was to get it recorded, was it?—A. It did get it recorded. I do not know the purpose.

Q. It is the rule there, the same as everywhere else, that a paper must either be sworn to or acknowledged in order to get it on record.—A. Papers have to be duly acknowledged by the grantor in order to get on record.

Q. Do you say it is limited to the grantor?—A. It is.

Q. Do you not think an acknowledgment by some one who saw the grantor sign the affidavit would put it on record?—A. Under some circumstances an affidavit may be made and record obtained.

Q. The purpose of recording it was just simply to preserve the contract or evidence of the contract, was it not?—A. As it stood it had absolutely no effect of that kind, if you wan that opinion as a matter of law.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, I object to a continuation of this inquiry about why a paper was recorded. It has already appeared that it was recorded by William P. Boland, and neither Judge Archbald nor Mr. Robertson, the grantor, knew anything about the matter. The manager is inquiring why it was recorded. The witness knows nothing of having it recorded, and how could he? The managers objected to what he knew of it and his mental operation, and now they ask his mental operation of William P. Boland, which I submit is very unfair to the witness.

Mr. Manager STERLING. To save time, I will withdraw the question.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to ask a general question of the judge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas presents a question which he wishes to propound to the witness. It will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Did it ever occur to you, in asking favors of railroad corporations as to culm dumps, where they might probably have cases before the Commerce Court, that you were putting yourself, as a member of the court, under obligations to the litigants before the court?

The WITNESS. I never consciously asked any favor of a railroad, either when I was a judge of the common pleas or a district judge or a Commerce Court judge. I did not understand, in endeavoring to make this deal, that I was asking a favor. I was simply presenting a matter to them as a business proposition. I expected them to treat it in that way, and I believe they did so.

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) Capt. May told you some time after the letter of March 31 that Richardson had been there, did he not?—A. I think he did over the telephone; yes.

Q. Did he not tell you on the street that he had been there?—A. I do not think he did.

Q. What did he say was the result of their conference?—A. I do not think he reported what was the result of the conference. I am sure he did not.

Q. Had he told you before that that he would have to see Mr. Richardson in regard to it?—A. He did.

Q. And after he had seen him, did you not ask him what the result was?—A. I presume I did; but I have no remembrance about it.

Q. Did he not tell you that Mr. Richardson was not disposed to part with the dump?—A. He never did.

Q. Did he tell you that he was disposed to part with it?—A. He never did.

Q. Did he never give you any satisfaction about it?—A. He never reported of the matter finally.

Q. Did you infer that Richardson was not disposed to sell it after May had seen him and when you found that May would not come to any conclusion about it?—A. I did not know that Capt. May had seen him. I had no inference about the matter.

Q. Did you not just say that he told you that Richardson had been to Scranton and that he had seen him about it?—A. No; I did not.

Q. Did he ever tell you that he had had a conference with Richardson about it?—A. He never did.

Q. Did you ask him if he had had the conference which he said he would have with him?—A. I do not remember that I did.

Q. Now, going back to the recording of this instrument, why, Judge, would not putting that instrument on record preserve the facts in the contract and be evidence of the contract?—A. That is a legal question, and I will take pleasure in answering it. Putting any document on record is simply to convey constructive notice. It has no effect to convey constructive notice unless it is, in the first place, a recordable instrument, and, in the next place, is put in such shape by acknowledgment or otherwise to be put on record. This contract never was put in legal shape to go on record, so that it was of no effect.

Q. I agree with you, Judge, that it was not constructive notice. That is not the question. But did it not serve to preserve the evidence of the contract in case the original had been lost?—A. It absolutely did not.

Q. Why?—A. Because the only way that it could do that would be by a certificate, and a certificate from the recorder of deeds of an unrecordable document would not amount to a piece of blotting paper.

Q. Could not persons who were familiar with the contract refer to the records to see what the contract provided——A. Not where——

Q. And parties who were familiar with it testify that it was a correct copy of the original contract, and in that way would it not preserve the evidence?—A. Absolutely not, unless it was a recordable contract and was prepared for record in accordance with the law.

Q. Would it not tell the same facts whether it was on record legally or illegally?—A. It would not convey the same legal constructive notice.

Q. No; it was not a notice, and I am not talking about a notice; but the facts that it contained would be just the same on the record whether it was recorded legally or illegally, would it not?—A. You are asking me for an opinion of the law, and I will give it. I say no.

Q. Is not that simply a question of fact, Judge?—A. Absolutely not; it is a question of law.

Q. Well, we will leave that. Your name was not in the option which May gave to Williams, was it?—A. It was not.

Q. You prepared the option from Robertson & Law to Williams?—A. From Mr. Robertson to Mr. Williams.

Q. And your name was in that, was it?—A. It was only there as a witness to Mr. Robertson's name.

Q. You were not a party to it at all?—A. Not in terms; no.

Q. In the papers, now, does your name appear in any of these transactions about the Katydid dump?—A. When I supposed we were going to make a sale to the Laurel Line—to Mr. Conn.

Q. That was after you had gotten the option?—A. After the option had been secured; yes.

Q. And when you first took it up with Conn, then, for the first time, you put your name in writings?—A. That was the first time that my name appeared.

Q. And after that was abandoned, then you ceased to put your name in the writings? You did not put it in the option to Mr. Thomas Star Jones, did you?—A. I did not put it in the option to Mr. Jones for the reasons which I have given.

Q. And your name was not in the Bradley contract?—A. I never had anything to do with the Bradley contract.

Q. I am not asking you about that. Do you know whether your name was in the Bradley contract?—A. I really do not know. I never saw that contract and never heard of it.

Q. You have seen a copy of it, have you not?—A. I have not.

Q. You heard it read before the Judiciary Committee, did you not?—A. I think I did.

Q. And you remember that your name was not in it?—A. I do not remember anything about it.

Q. Judge, do you know whether or not in these transactions from the 31st day of March for a year your name appeared in the contracts except in the letter you wrote to Mr. Conn and the contract to Conn?—A. I think that is true.

Q. Do you remember hearing Mr. Conn testify before the Judiciary Committee?—A. I heard his testimony there.

Q. Do you remember that he testified there never was any written contract submitted to him?—A. I believe he did.

Q. You were present there at that time?—A. I was.

Q. And had the contract with you?—A. I do not remember whether I had the contract with me at that time. I think I did not.

Q. You knew at the time that Mr. Conn was mistaken about it, did you not?—A. I knew it when I came to look up the matter; yes.

Q. Did you not know at the time that you had prepared the contract and that he was mistaken about it?—A. I knew I had prepared the contract; yes.

Q. Did you correct him about it?—A. Correct him before the Judiciary Committee?

Q. At any time, whether there or elsewhere?—A. Not before the Judiciary Committee, certainly.

Q. You did not correct him until about the time these proceedings had commenced in the Senate, did you?—A. Oh, yes; well——

Q. Then, you sent word to him there was a contract, and he asked you to let him see it?—A. I met him one day upon the street; we talked on this point, and I told him that he was mistaken; that I had the contract, and would show it to him.

Q. That was shortly before these proceedings in the Senate?—A. No; that was in the summer after these articles had been preferred and the impeachment had started.

Q. About what time was it in the summer?—A. I should say along in August or September.

Q. Judge, your first connection with the Marian Coal Co. proposition was when Watson came to you?—A. Yes.

Q. Refreshing your recollection, had you not had a talk with Watson before Watson had been employed by the Bolands——A. I had none——

Q. In which you suggested to him that he might get that work?—A. I do not know where you got that idea, because it is unfounded in any fact.

Q. You say, then, that he came to your office one day and told you that he had been employed by the Bolands?—A. He came to see me—I could not tell exactly where—and told me that he had been employed to try to settle the Marian Coal Co. case with the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad.

Q. Was not that in your office?—A. I presume it was; I do not remember.

Q. Do you remember what was said?—A. Nothing, except in just that general way at that conversation, and the further fact that he inquired whether I was acquainted, and how well I was acquainted, with Mr. Loomis, and asked me whether I would not see Mr. Loomis and tell him that if he would call Mr. Watson in the case he was authorized to effect a settlement.

Q. Who was Mr. Loomis?—A. Mr. Loomis was a gentleman who lived in Scranton, with whom I was personally and socially acquainted, and who was at the time I speak of vice president of the D. L. & W. Railroad, having offices in New York.

Q. Had he any other position with the railroads?—A. None but vice president that I know of.

Q. And the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. was the company against whom the Bolands, or the Marian Coal Co., had a suit pending in the Interstate Commerce Commission?—A. Before the Interstate Commerce Commission; yes.

Q. You knew that at that time?—A. That was stated.

Q. And also the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western had two suits pending before the Commerce Court at that time?—A. I did not know it at that conversation. I did not know, in other words, that they were interested in what has been spoken of here as the Lighterage case. I do not remember whether they were or not.

Q. Did you not say in your answer to this article that you did know the fact that they had these cases pending in your court?—A. I do not remember what I say in my answer on that subject.

Q. When was it that Watson came to you?—A. As I have said to you just now, a day or two before I saw Mr. Loomis in New York.

Q. Well, I want the time as nearly as you can give it.—A. I saw Mr. Loomis in New York on the 4th of August, 1911.

Q. Had not Loomis been before the court arguing this very case shortly before that?—A. Mr. Loomis?

Q. Mr. Brownell, I mean.—A. Mr. Brownell never appeared before the Commerce Court except in one case.

Q. What case was that?—A. That was the Sugar Refinery or Lighterage case, which was disposed of in May.

Q. When did he argue it?—A. Why, I have my book here, I think. I am not sure whether I have it.

Q. You heard the argument?—A. I did.

Q. And it was in May?—A. It was in May.

Q. The Delaware, Lackawanna & Western was a party to that suit, was it not?—A. I do not remember that they were.

Q. Was it a party to No. 38?—A. I do not remember.

Q. Do you not know that the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western was a party both to Nos. 38 and 39?—A. You ask me for my memory, and I say I do not.

Q. Do you say now that it was not?—A. I do not; the record speaks for itself.

Q. Are you familiar with the answer which you made to this charge?—A. Well, I was familiar with it at the time I made it.

Q. Do you remember that you say in that answer that you knew that that railroad company had a suit pending in your court?—A. I do not remember what I say upon that subject in my answer.

Q. And that it had been argued in your court already before that?—A. I do not remember what I say in my answer; it is there.

Q. You told Watson you would assist?—A. I did not speak to him in that way at all. He asked me to do this simple favor, which was simply to make a way for him. I told him that I would try to see Mr. Loomis, and I did.

Q. You went to his office in New York to see him?—A. I did.

Q. Had you seen him before that?—A. I saw him when he was in Scranton many times, but I never saw him upon this matter before that time.

Q. Why did you not speak to him in Scranton about it?—A. The first time I spoke to him in Scranton was about three weeks after——

Q. Why did you not speak to him when you saw him in Scranton without going to New York?—A. Why did I not speak to him?

Q. Yes; about this matter.—A. About this matter?

Q. Yes.—A. I had no occcasion to speak to him about this matter before Mr. Watson asked me.

Q. When did Mr. Watson come to you?—A. I said about a day or two before I saw Mr. Loomis in New York.

Q. And that was the 4th of August when you were in New York?—A. Yes.

Q. The same day that you saw Brownell and Richardson about the Katydid culm dump?—A. Yes.

Q. At the time Watson first spoke to you about it, do you say that Christy Boland was not present?—A. He was not.

Q. Do you say that he was not present at any time when Watson and you talked about the matter?—A. I do not remember his ever being present when Mr. Watson and I talked about the matter, and I am satisfied that I would remember it if he were, because I remember quite distinctly three or four times when Mr. Boland came there and shut the door and was very secretive in what he said.

Q. Let me refresh your recollection, Judge. When Watson was in your office talking about the settlement of this matter——A. You mean the first time?

Q. Any time. Did not Mr. Boland come in on account of a telephone call, or for any other reason, and did you not say to him then, "Now, I understand that you have employed Mr. Watson in this matter, that he is to dispose of this property and settle these suits for $100,000, and that his fee is to be $5,000"?—A. I do not remember Mr. Watson and Mr. Boland ever being together in my office. I never remember, of course, any such conversation as you suggest.

Q. When was it that Phillips came to your house?—A. I think the very last day that I was in Scranton before coming down here to attend the October session of the Commerce Court.

Q. He came to your house at your request?—A. Not at my request, as I remember, but by appointment.

Q. Well, you asked for the appointment, did you not?—A. I think, when I refresh my memory in this respect by what he himself has testified, that there was some telephone communication between him and me with regard to seeing him in the morning, which was Saturday, and he wanted to fix it in the afternoon. I told him that that was the time when I took my Saturday walk. It was then put over until evening, and he came to see me at my house.

Q. And you invited the conversation over the telephone, did you not—you called him up?—A. I do not remember whether I called him up or whether he called me up.

Q. Why would he call you up, Judge?—A. He would call me up only in case it had been suggested by Mr. Loomis or Mr. Reese or some officer of the company.

Q. Do you know whether that had happened?—A. I do not remember.

Q. Had Watson at that time seen you in regard to the matter?—A. As I say, he saw me just before I saw Mr. Loomis.

Q. Well, he came over there and you talked at some length about this matter?—A. Yes; when Mr. Phillips came there, you will remember, it was nearly two months after I had seen Mr. Loomis.

Q. It was just before you went to New York, then, when you saw Loomis?—A. You mean that I saw Mr. Phillips.

Q. Yes.—A. Oh, no; I do not see why you suggest that.

Q. I am not suggesting it; I am just asking you.—A. It certainly was not. As I say, I saw Mr. Loomis on the 4th of August, and the time that Mr. Phillips was at my house was on the 28th of September, along in the very last part of September.

Q. Had you written any letters to Loomis prior to the time Watson came over?—A. I do not recall the letters. They are in evidence, and I recall that I wrote those letters.

Q. How many letters did you write to Loomis?—A. I think I wrote two, or maybe I wrote three; I am not sure about that.

Q. Did you do that by reason of the fact that Watson came to you and asked you simply to speak to Loomis about it, so as to give him a favorable introduction?—A. No; that was by reason of what followed on that.

Q. When Phillips came to your house you talked at some length?—A. Well, Mr. Phillips did a good deal of the talking.

Q. And he told you about the situation?—A. Yes.

Q. And told you that Watson wanted $161,000 for the property?—A. No; he did not say that.

Q. What did he say?—A. As I remember, he mainly went over the troubles and difficulties that they had with the Marian Coal Co. and with Mr. W. P. Boland with regard to washing, cleaning, preparing, and shipping coal and with regard to the value of what there was left in the Marian washery and the dump.

Q. Well, you did talk about the great difference between the two parties to the settlement, did you not?—A. No; he suggested that there was a wide difference.

Q. Did he tell you what that difference was?—A. No; he only spoke about the little value that there was; so small a value, as he considered it, in the remains of the Marian washery that his company did not feel as though they could make any offer with regard to it.

Q. And you said yourself, then, to Mr. Phillips, that the parties were very far apart and it did not look hopeful, did you not?—A. No; I do not think I said that; I do not remember that I said that.

Q. Do you remember hearing Mr. Phillips testify to that?—A. No; I do not remember hearing him testify to that.

Q. Did you make any remark of that kind?—A. I would not say that I did not.

Q. You knew at that time that Watson had presented a proposition of $161,000?—A. I remembered that Mr. Watson had mentioned that amount.

Q. Did you understand that that was what he demanded of the railroad company?—A. I understood that that was the claim that he was retained to present.

Q. So you knew, then, after the talk with Mr. Phillips, what the difference between the parties was, did you not?—A. I knew that there was a wide difference; yes.

Q. When did Watson first tell you that that claim was for $161,000?—A. Well, I can not tell you whether it was the very first time—I do not think it was—I think it was at some interview which I can not specifically fix.

Q. How is that?—A. I can not specifically fix the time when he said that.

Q. It was on September 27 that Loomis wrote you that he found there was very little, if any, prospect of reaching a settlement in the case owing to the great difference of opinion as to the merits of Mr. Boland's claim. Then you answered the next day, did you not?—A. If my letters are there I did; I do not remember the date.

Q. It is dated September 28, and says:

MY DEAR MR. LOOMIS: I am very sorry to have your letter stating that you have not been able to effect a settlement with Mr. Boland. I trust, however, that the matter is still not beyond remedy. And if I thought that it would help to secure an adjustment, I would offer my direct services.

Do you remember writing that letter?—A. I wrote that letter.

Q. And that is, after you knew, after Watson had told you, that the claim was for $161,000?—A. That certainly is. It was also after Mr. Boland had seen me two or three times and importuned me to see whether something could not be done about the matter.

Q. Judge, why did you put that in your answer?—A. Why did I put what in?

Q. Why did you tell about the Bolands being to see you? Did I ask you anything about that? Did you understand my question to call for any answer about the Bolands?—A. Well, I answered it in that way.

Q. Why did you do so?—A. Because I wanted that fact brought out.

Q. Because you want to impress Senators with the idea that the Bolands were trying to impose on you, or something of that kind; was that it?—A. I do not put it in that way; I want to give them the facts.

Q. I shall insist, Judge, that you confine your answers to my questions.—A. I will try to do so.

Q. Then, after that, you wrote as follows:

MY DEAR MR. LOOMIS: I understand that there has been a suggestion that Mr. Watson meet you and possibly also Mr. Truesdale, and that Mr. Watson has written asking for an appointment. It seems to me, if I may be permitted to say so, that this is a very good idea. It will give you an opportunity to discuss the Boland claim with Mr. Watson upon a somewhat different basis than Col. Phillips could, representing the coal department.

I have little doubt but that it will appear so to you, and it may be altogether unnecessary for me to write about it. But I am sure you will not take it amiss to have me do so, and I shall hope that a settlement may yet be reached in that way. There is nothing like a personal interview to bring about such a result.

Yours, very truly, R. W. ARCHBALD.

That letter is dated October 3. That letter did bring a personal interview, did it not?—A. I understood it did.

Q. It got Truesdale and Loomis and Phillips and Reese, all officials of this company, together in Scranton to talk over the matter with Mr. Watson, did it not?—A. I do not know about that. I was not present. I was here in Washington when that letter was written.

Q. You did know that they had a conference?—A. I have heard in the course of this proceeding that there was a conference at that time.

Q. Who was Mr. Truesdale?—A. Mr. Truesdale has been here on the stand. He is president of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad.

Q. And Mr. Loomis is vice president?—A. I think so.

Q. And Mr. Phillips is superintendent of the coal property?—A. General manager of the coal company.

Q. And what is Mr. Reese's position?—A. I think Mr. Reese is local attorney.

Q. That conference occurred on the 5th of October, did it not?—A. I do not know; I was here; I was not in Scranton.

Q. You were in Washington?—A. I was.

Q. On the 6th you got a telegram from Watson, did you not?—A. I think it was the 6th.

Q. Asking you when he could meet you in Washington, and you wired back "almost any time"?—A. Yes.

Q. Did he wire you to meet him at the Raleigh Hotel?—A. He wired that he would be at the Raleigh.

Q. And he got here on the 7th?—A. He got here on Saturday, the 7th; yes.

Q. He told you, did he not, that he had had this conference?—A. I do not remember whether he told me, but I presume very likely he did. I do not see how we could be together without his saying that.

Q. Why did he come to see you after the conference in which these railroad officials had told him that there was no object in carrying on negotiations any further?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. That is another question, Mr. President, involving what was in the mind of some one else. You can ask what he said.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I will put it in this form: What reason did Watson give you for coming to Washington to see you after the conference with the railroad officials?—A. Mr. Watson told me that the Bolands were not content unless he came down here to see me to ascertain whether anything further could be done.

Q. What did you tell him about it?—A. I told him I did not see what could be done further.

Q. You went to the Raleigh Hotel?—A. I did.

Q. And you were standing on the sidewalk in front of the hotel waiting when he came?—A. No; I was in the lobby, I think. My remembrance is that I was in the lobby.

Q. Is Watson mistaken about that?—A. I would not undertake to say whether he is mistaken about it. I am just giving you my memory.

Q. Do you remember what his testimony was?—A. I do not.

Q. It was that you were waiting outside; that he came there to see you; and that you went together to the Commerce Court building?—A. My remembrance about it is this way——

Q. Wait. Do you remember Watson's testimony to that effect?—A. I do not.

Q. Now, refreshing your recollection in that way, is not that the fact about it, Judge?—A. It is not. The fact, as I remember it, is that it was a very cold, stormy day. He came in about half past 1. I went down there and sat in the lobby of the Raleigh, and waited until he came in.

Q. Did he tell you what had been said at the conference?—A. I have not any memory about the matter.

Q. Did he tell you who was present?—A. I do not remember that he told me anything about it. I only say that I assume that he must have done so.

Q. But you have no recollection of what he said?—A. I have not.

Q. Why is it, Judge, that your recollection about that incident and about the question as to whether or not Christy Boland talked to you about the $100,000 is not clear, when it is so very clear in regard to some other things? Do you know?—A. If you will give me the philosophy of life I will tell you why people can remember some things and some things they can not.

Q. It is true, Judge, that people remember the more important incidents of a transaction rather than the trivial ones, do they not?—A. They remember more clearly where they are themselves interested in matters than where they are simply interested for others.

Q. Who owned Packer No. 3, Judge?—A. I understood that it belonged to the Girard estate in one sense, but was under lease to the Lehigh Coal Co., or covered at least by a lease which runs out this year.

Q. And the Lehigh Coal Co. is a subsidiary of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.?—A. I have always understood that there was a close connection between the two.

Q. What official position does Mr. Warriner hold in those corporations?—A. Mr. Warriner at that time, as I understood, was general superintendent of the coal company.

Q. And where was his place of business?—A. In Wilkes-Barre.

Q. How far is that from Scranton?—A. About 20 miles.

Q. You went to see Warriner, did you not, in behalf of Packer No. 3?—A. For the purpose of endeavoring to secure Packer No. 3.

Q. At that time you and one of the Joneses and some other gentlemen were about to organize a corporation to handle that property?—A. If we secured that lease we expected to organize a company to wash the dump.

Q. Do you remember the capital stock of the corporation?—A. I think it was to be $25,000.

Q. Was any of it to be paid in?—A. The money for that purpose was to be obtained——

Q. Just answer my question.—A. I could not tell you. We would pay it in if it was necessary.

Q. You expected to get the money from Mr. Farrell, of New York?—A. That was the arrangement.

Q. Mr. Jones had told you he could get it in that way?—A. I think I had seen Mr. Farrell myself. I know I did see him before the matter was consummated.

Q. At the time you planned this it was not the purpose of the stockholders or organizers of this company to put up any money?—A. We would not put up any money unless we had to.

Q. Well, what did Mr. Warriner tell you?—A. About leasing that property?

Q. Yes.—A. He said he thought the company would be willing to lease the property.

Q. He told you on what terms?—A. He spoke of the terms.

Q. And you went back and reported to your associates, did you not?—A. I did.

Q. And then you had a conference with Mr. Farrell, of New York?—A. I think this conference with Mr. Farrell occurred after that; yes.

Q. In which he agreed to put up all the money necessary to operate the dump?—A. To put up enough to build the washery.

Q. To put up $25,000?—A. Yes; fully that.

Q. And he was to get a certain per cent of the profits, besides his interest and his principal back?—A. He was to get a quarter of the profits, and be secured by a mortgage upon the lease and the property, the washery, whatever it was.

Q. For his principal and interest?—A. Yes; for his principal and interest, and to get back the principal and interest at so much a ton.

Q. What interest were you to have in the profits?—A. The interests were divided around. Mr. Bell and Mr. Petersen were invited in. They were associated together in other matters, and they were given a certain interest. Mr. Jones told me he was obligated to Mr. Helibut to a certain extent and also to Mr. Howell Harris, and they were given certain interests, and after deducting those interests what was left was divided between Mr. Jones and myself.

Q. How much was that?—A. I do not know whether I can remember the different things. I think 25 or 26 per cent; that is to say, Mr. Jones and I were to get a quarter of what the company got.

Q. Was not the stock to be divided equally between you and seven or eight other gentlemen?—A. Oh, no.

Q. Anyway, you and Mr. Jones were to get a fourth or a little over a fourth?—A. Not a fourth of the profits of actually washing the dump, because a quarter of that was to go to Mr. Farrell.

Q. You were to get a fourth of the balance?—A. About a fourth of the balance; yes.

Q. Why were you to have any interest in that stock?—A. Why not?

Q. Well, why not, after you had gone to see Mr. Warriner; is that your idea?—A. I see no reason why, after organizing that company, that enterprise, I was not entitled to a share. It would be very strange if I did not have a share.

Q. Why?—A. Because I was instrumental in part in organizing the company—getting it up. It was in part my scheme and part Mr. Jones's.

Q. And instrumental in acquiring the property?—A. To a certain extent; yes.

Q. Was it not entirely due to you that you acquired this property from Mr. Warriner?—A. I do not think so.

Q. Did anybody else than you see Mr. Warriner?—A. No; I saw Mr. Warriner. But the property was not obtained alone from Mr. Warriner.

Q. Who else did it come from?—A. The main thing had to be arranged with the Girard estate.

Q. Who arranged that?—A. I endeavored to, and did in part with my nephew.

Q. And you did all that was done in reference to acquiring the property, both from Mr. Warriner, of the Lehigh Valley, and the Girard estate?—A. I did, except so far as an application was jointly made by myself and my associates to the Girard estate.

Q. And who made it?—A. I drew up that form.

Q. And all of you signed it?—A. They all signed it.

Q. So all that anybody, except yourself, did with reference to getting this property from the Lehigh Co. was simply your associates signing the application which you had drawn after you had been to see the Girard estate and after you had seen the Lehigh Valley people?—A. The application was made to the Girard estate——

Q. Answer my question.—A. I do not think I can.

Mr. Manager STERLING. Let the question be read.

The Reporter read the question.

The WITNESS. All that was done in regard to the acquisition of it directly was done by me.

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) And it was as a consideration for your services in getting this property from the Lehigh people that they gave you a one-half interest in one-fourth of the profits?—A. That is not so.

Q. Well, what other reason was there?—A. The matter was arranged between Mr. Jones and me, and it was Mr. Jones and myself that determined what interest Mr. Peterson and Mr. Bell should have and what interest should be given to Mr. Hellbut and Mr. Howell Harris.

Q. Then I will put it this way: You kept such interest as you did keep and it was conceded to you by Mr. Jones by reason of the fact that you had seen Mr. Warriner about getting the Lehigh Valley Co.'s interest?—A. That is not so either.

Q. What is your idea about it?—A. Mr. Jones and I talked, of course, about the organization of this concern, and the obtaining of the dump, and we had to make a practicable concern. We had to have somebody to operate it, like Mr. Petersen, and somebody who could assist in the organization and in the carrying on, like Mr. Bell, so we arranged with them to come into the company so that we might have a suitable organization.

Q. You gave them an interest because you would have somebody in the company who could operate it?—A. Yes.

Q. You got into it because they wanted somebody who could go to the railroad companies. Now, is not that the long and short of it?—A. No; it is not. I did not get into it. They are the ones that got in.

Q. Anyhow you did perform that part of the service?—A. I certainly did.

Q. You never did put up any money, did you?—A. The matter has never been disposed of.

Q. Why did you not finally close up that deal, Judge?—A. Because the Girard estate had never arranged for the lease, the renewal of the lease, which expires this year. They were not willing, I am informed, to make any arrangement with anyone outside until that had been determined.

Q. Let us go to the Warnke case. As I understand it, Mr. Warnke was operating a dump under a lease from some railroad company. What railroad company was that?—A. He was not operating a dump——

Q. He had been——A. (Continuing.) From any railroad, as I remember it.

Q. He had been. What dump had he been operating?—A. I can tell you only in the vaguest way, because I have never seen the property and only know what he said. I will give you what he said.

Q. Well, put it in that way, Judge. Just so I have your information on the subject.—A. I understood from him that about two years before that he had been operating under a lease. I think that lease was to a man by the name of Baer Snyder, and that he had taken an assignment from this party, and, among other things, that included underground workings and also a washery.

Q. But the lease was made by the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., was it not?—A. To whom?

Q. To the gentleman who assigned it to Mr. Warnke.—A. I do not know. I know that ultimately the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. had control of the situation.

Q. And that company is a subsidiary of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co.?—A. I have always understood so.

Q. There is another company by the name of the Reading Co., which owns all the stock of both of those corporations?—A. I know nothing about that.

Q. Whom did you go to in the interest of Warnke?—A. I went to Mr. Richards.

Q. Who is Mr. Richards?—A. Mr. Richards, I think, is general manager or vice president, or something or other, of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., he having charge of their operations in Schuylkill County.

Q. And you went to him because Mr. Warnke had been operating under a lease which had been made and which had been assigned to Mr. Warnke?—A. Yes.

Q. By the original lessee?—A. Yes.

Q. Where did Mr. Richards live?—A. At Pottsville, Pa.

Q. That was 80 miles from Scranton?—A. About that.

Q. And you went up there to see him after you had made an appointment with him over the phone or by letter?—A. I went primarily to Pottsville to see my nephew with regard to the leasing of Packer No. 3, and in that connection I arranged with Mr. Richards to see him upon that visit.

Q. On the day when you went to Pottsville, 80 miles from Scranton, you had two coal-dump deals on hand, had you?—A. If you want to put it that way—oh, no; I did not have any coal-dump deal with Richards.

Q. It related to Packer No. 3, did it not?—A. With Mr. Richards?

Q. No; with your nephew.—A. Yes; that. But I did not have two culm-dump deals on my hands.

Q. What was the character of the transaction with Mr. Richards? It related to a culm dump, did it not?—A. Simply to see whether he would not reconsider the decision he had made with regard to Warnke.

Q. It was with reference to a culm dump, was it not?—A. Yes.

Q. And Mr. Warnke told you that if you did not succeed in getting him to continue the lease, to see if you could get the Lincoln dump?—A. Yes.

Q. And Mr. Richards told you he would not reconsider?—A. Yes.

Q. And they had given their final answer to Warnke?—A. He brought a bunch of papers, quite a bundle of papers——

Q. Just answer my question, please.—A. Yes; you are right.

Q. Then you went home and told Mr. Warnke the result of your trip?—A. Yes.

Q. And suggested to him that you could get him a dump belonging to the Lacoe & Shiffer Co. on the Delaware & Hudson?—A. No; absolutely not. There is not a particle of fact in either of those statements.

Q. Did you not suggest that to him at any time?—A. I did not.

Q. Who did?—A. The only suggestion that was made and the only way that Warnke came in in connection with that was that Mr. John Henry Jones tried to sell that at first to the Central Brewing Co., and the Central Brewing Co. sent Warnke there to see the dump and pronounce upon it.

Q. How did he come in connection with you in regard to the matter?—A. The Central Brewing Co. would not buy it.

Q. Well, that had not anything to do with his coming to you about it. How did he come to come to you about it, or did you go to him?—A. With regard to that fill?

Q. Yes.—A. Because I had these letters and options with Mr. Berry with regard to it, and had the disposition of it practically.

Q. Can you answer the question as to how you and Warnke came to meet with reference to the gravity fill; did he come to you or did you go to him?—A. Mr. Warnke came to see me about that.

Q. How did he learn that you had it?—A. Through Mr. John Henry Jones.

Q. And that was after you had failed to get the Lincoln dump?—A. Well, I do not remember whether it was or not.

Q. What is your best recollection about that?—A. I could not tell you about that.

Q. It was not until after he found he could not get the Lincoln dump or a continuance of his lease with the Reading people——A. I would not be sure of that.

Q. That he undertook to buy the Lacoe & Shiffer dump, was it?—A. I would not be sure about that. It may be so.

Q. Anyhow, he bought the Lacoe & Shiffer dump?—A. No; he did not.

Q. Well, his company, the Premier Coal Co.—A. The company which was organized. He got Mr. Swingle and his brother-in-law, and Mr.——

Q. Judge, the Premier Coal Co. bought it?—A. The Premier Coal Co. bought the fill.

Q. And Mr. Warnke carried on the negotiations with you?—A. He did not.

Q. Did he not come to see you about it?—A. He did.

Q. What was said and done?—A. He suggested that he would like to buy that dump. He knew what the price was as stated; I think at that time Mr. Berry had offered to dispose of the dump for $6,000 cash. Mr. Warnke could not raise that amount. He had $2,000. He wanted to make an arrangement by which the $2,000 would be accepted and the balance paid by a royalty arrangement.

Q. Why did he come to you in regard to it?—A. As I say, he knew that I had the arrangement with Mr. Berry in regard to the disposition of it.

Q. Is it not true that at that time your option from Mr. Berry had expired?—A. The written option, yes; but not the verbal arrangement with him.

Q. You remember Mr. Berry testified the other day that at that time the option had expired?—A. I heard his testimony.

Q. Was not that true?—A. It is not true. I made the arrangement finally by which the parties were brought together.

Q. Yes; finally; but under your option agreement with Mr. Berry, who had the matter in charge, they were not bound to let you have it at that time?—A. That is very true.

Q. That is true?—A. Yes; that is very true.

Q. Anyhow, they bought this Lacoe-Shiffer dump?—A. Yes; the Premier Coal Co. did.

Q. And after that they gave you a note for $510; after you had been up to see Mr. Richards at Pottsville, and after you had talked with Mr. Warnke about the gravity fill, then it was they gave you this note for $510, was it not?—A. In matter of time, yes; but there was no connection at all between them.

Q. I am not asking you about that.—A. But you put that in your question, and I do not propose to answer the question that way.

Q. Well, we will see. Was it after you had been to Pottsville to see Mr. Richards, and after your transaction with Mr. Warnke in reference to the Lacoe & Shiffer dump, called the old gravity fill, that they gave you this note?—A. In the matter of time, yes.

Q. That is all the question relates to—the matter of time.—A. I do not so understand the question.

Q. And you went to the office to get the note?—A. The note was sent to me at my office.

Q. Why did you go to get it?—A. The note, when first drawn, was not correctly drawn. It was drawn to my order instead of the order of the parties that were to indorse it.

Q. You mean the note was made payable to you or order.—A. It was made payable to my order. It did not have their indorsement.

Q. They signed it, did they not?—A. They signed it after my indorsement. That would not make bankable paper—not with us.

Q. So you objected to that note because it was made payable to your order?—A. Yes; because it was not made properly.

Q. Legally it was a good note?—A. Legally it was a good note; yes; but it made me the first indorser instead of them being ahead of me on the note.

Q. So you had it made out to the company, and signed by them?—A. I had it made out to these individuals of the company who were to be the indorsers.

Q. And signed by them?—A. And they indorsed it.

Q. Then you indorsed it and got the money?—A. I negotiated it at my bank.

Q. How many times did you go to their office to get this?—A. Once.

Q. Did you not go twice?—A. I do not think I did.

Q. Did you not ask for the money the first time?—A. No; I had a talk over the telephone and it was arranged that they would give a note.

Q. Do you remember the testimony of Mr. Kiser?—A. I do not remember the testimony of Mr. Kiser.

Q. Do you think he is mistaken about your having come there twice?—A. I will pronounce judgment upon whether he is mistaken or not.

Q. You did not invest any money in any of these schemes, did you?—A. I do not know what schemes you refer to.

Q. I will say the old gravity fill. Did you have any investment in that?—A. I invested no money in that.

Q. You did not have to put up any money with Mr. Berry in order to get the option?—A. I did not.

Q. And he simply gave you a certain length of time within which you could say whether you would take it or not?—A. He gave me an option, which has been put in evidence.

Q. And if you could sell it at a profit within that time you would take it, and if not you did not intend to take it?—A. That is right.

Q. In any of these transactions did you engage in a contract whereby you were bound to pay any money?—A. I do not know that I did. I certainly would have to pay money to secure the rights of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. in the Katydid dump and also to Mr. Robertson to get anything out of it.

Q. Not until after you had sold it?—A. Not until after we had sold the property.

Q. And not until after you had found a buyer did you expect to put up any money?—A. We hoped to find a buyer.

Q. And thought you had found one?—A. We did.

Q. What is your financial condition?—A. I have been a judge for 28 years, and my financial condition is not the best.

Q. Have you property outside of your home property in Scranton?—A. I have not. Oh, I have some little property outside of that.

Q. You testified yesterday about the correspondence you had with Mr. Helm Bruce?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. I wish you would state briefly what it was that inspired you to write the first letter to Mr. Helm Bruce.—A. As I explained yesterday, the first letter was written when I was formulating a dissenting opinion. May I have my papers there? [After examination of papers.] The consultation of the Commerce Court with regard to that case I find entered on my notes. I keep notebooks of arguments. I also keep a memorandum of the way cases are to be decided. I hold in my hands the notes of that case. At our consultation on that case on the 27th of May, 1911, a conclusion was reached in favor of the defendant. Judge Knapp was to write the opinion, and I expressed a dissent. I addressed myself to formulating a dissent and wrote up a dissenting opinion, as the manuscript of the opinion which I have here in my hand will show. That was done in September following. It was while I was examining the case for the purpose of expressing my dissenting opinion that I wrote to Mr. Helm Bruce with regard to Mr. Compton's testimony.

Q. Asking him to make the explanation?—A. Yes.

Q. Which he did by way of a letter?—A. Yes.

Q. Now, as I understand it, you did not send a copy of that letter to any of the counsel on the other side of the case?—A. No; I did not.

Q. And you did not converse with any of the other members of the court about it?—A. I did not.

Q. Did it not occur to you, Judge, that it would be appropriate for you to send to counsel on the other side of the case a copy of the letter you sent to Mr. Bruce?—A. As I say, I was writing a dissenting opinion. It did not call for any argument, and was only what you might say a very inconsiderable matter in the course of the case.

Q. Just answer my question. Did it occur to you——A. Please have it read.

Q. Did it occur to you that it would be appropriate for you to send copies to counsel for the other side?—A. It did not or I would have written them.

Q. You got an answer from Mr. Bruce?—A. I did.

Q. Which sustained your views on the point?—A. Yes.

Q. Then you wrote him again?—A. Yes.

Q. On August 26? What inspired that letter?—A. On what date?

Q. August 26.—A. I do not remember any letter of that date.

Q. I will read it:

AUGUST 26, 1911.

MY DEAR MR. BRUCE: I thank you for your letter of August 24 with reference to Mr. Compton's testimony, about which I wrote you.

You are not disputing that letter?—A. No.

Q. And then you got another letter, did you not, and after that, on January 10, you wrote to Mr. Bruce again—A. Yes.

Q. And you wrote from Indian River, Fla., did you not?—A. Yes.

Q. What inspired that letter? You had already acknowledged receipt of Mr. Bruce's letter.—A. That was to meet a question which had been raised by Judge Mack with regard to the disposition of that case. When we met together in October—when the Commerce Court met together in October—we had a further consultation over the case, and, according to my memorandum here, that occurred on October 21, and upon that we reversed the former conclusion of the court and were all agreed that the plaintiff was entitled to a decree, except Judge Mack. The case was then decided, virtually decided, so far as our consultation was concerned, so far as the agreement of the court was concerned, upon that date. It was on January 10 I wrote this letter, after our consultation, which was purely a matter of settling the form of the opinion.

Q. So, when you wrote the first letter, you were engaged in writing a dissenting opinion. Do I understand you correctly?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And afterwards the court reversed itself and came to your view of the case?—A. All except Judge Mack.

Q. Did the argument which you adduced by reason of your correspondence with Mr. Bruce have anything to do with changing the minds of the other judges?—A. It was not communicated to them, and so it could not have had any effect.

Q. No; the letter was not communicated to them, but did you present to the court the facts which you had gotten through the letter?—A. I do not remember that I did.

Q. Did you not make use of the information you got——A. Not at all.

Q. In the consideration of the case?—A. If I could——

Q. Just answer the question.—A. No.

Q. Anyhow, the court afterwards came to your view of the case?—A. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. I submit the following question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio submits a question. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Do you regard it as good practice to communicate with counsel on one side of a case, either on an issue of fact or of law, without advising opposing counsel?

The WITNESS. I certainly do not. That has not been my practice. I would not defend or attempt to defend any such practice as that.

Mr. JONES. I desire to submit two questions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington submits two questions to be propounded to the witness, which will be so propounded in the order in which they are numbered.

The Secretary read as follows:

You expected to submit your dissenting opinion to the other members of the court, did you not?

The WITNESS. I did submit my opinion. I sent it in advance to the other judges, a copy to each one, prior to our coming together in October following the date of the opinion.

The Secretary read as follows:

If you answer that you did, did it not occur to you that you should show your associates the letters you had received; and if not, why not?

The WITNESS. There was only one letter that had been received at that time with regard to what is really a very inconsiderable part of the opinion, and, as the opinion itself shows, what is stated in Mr. Bruce's letter with regard to Mr. Compton's testimony does not enter into the decision of the case at all, because it is assumed in the opinion that, contrary to what is stated in Mr. Bruce's letter, the statement of Mr. Compton, the witness, was exactly the other way. I could show that in two minutes by this opinion itself. And that part of the opinion was written by Judge Knapp.

Q. Now you are speaking of the first letter with reference to Compton's testimony.—A. Yes.

Q. But you have not stated, Judge, what inspired the second letter to Helm Bruce.—A. The ideas that had been advanced by Judge Mack in consultation in regard to the question of variations from what was known as the Cooley award I would very much like to go into if the Senate had patience to listen.

Q. I just want the facts in the case. Did you send a copy of that second letter to Mr. Bruce to counsel on the other side of the case?—A. I did not.

Q. Did it occur to you that it would be a very proper thing for you to do at that time?—A. No; or I would have done it.

Q. Judge, you say it is not your practice to write counsel on one side without giving notice to the other. Why did you make an exception in this case, if that has been your general practice?—A. We were simply at that time engaged in settling the form of the opinion. We had decided how we would dispose of the case, and it was simply with regard to this incidental matter in the course of the opinion.

Q. Judge, in reply to that second letter you got an additional argument from Helm Bruce, did you not?—A. I got a letter.

Q. And it consisted of two pages and a half of finely printed matter in the proceedings of the Senate. That is what you got in reply?—A. Yes; I believe it does.

Q. And it is an argument in the case, is it not?—A. It is an argument.

Q. Did you submit a copy of that to the counsel on the other side, so that they might answer it?—A. I have already said not.

Q. Then after you had received that you wrote:

MY DEAR MR. BRUCE: I thank you for your letter and its kind appreciation of the opinion of the court in the New Orleans Board of Trade case; but you fail to take credit for the very important part which you played in the result. Frankly, the case was won on your argument and brief. Your oral argument was one of the best that we have heard, and your brief was an absolute demonstration of the errors committed by the commission and complete at every point. You can not fail to note how closely the opinion follows and reflects what is there said.

Now, Judge, do you not think that this correspondence that you had with Bruce had its effect upon your mind, and consequently upon the court, and that it was absolutely unfair to the other side of the case for you to carry on that correspondence in the way you did?—A. I certainly do not. What is spoken of in that letter——

Q. That is all I asked for; just that.—A. You have read the letter and you have endeavored to put into the question you put things that the letter does not apply to at all. That letter you have last read has nothing to do with this letter of January 10. It refers——

Q. I read the letter correctly so far as I read it, did I not?—A. You read it correctly; yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I send a question to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas propounds an inquiry, which will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

In one of the letters to Mr. Bruce you referred to a proposed conference with him in which you would explain to him the causes of delay in deciding the case. What was the proposed explanation?

The WITNESS. That is, why was the case delayed the way it was? Do I understand that that is the question?

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the question be read again, Mr. President.

The WITNESS. I want to understand the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be again read.

The Secretary read as follows:

In one of the letters to Mr. Bruce you referred to a proposed conference with him in which you would explain to him the causes of delay in deciding the case. What was the proposed explanation?

Mr. CULBERSON. If I may do so, I will ask that that letter be read in this connection.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. That is what I was going to suggest.

Mr. Manager STERLING. Which letter is that?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. The letter that Judge Archbald wrote, on page 624.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That letter has already been read.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. The first part of it was read and the part to which the Senator refers is the second paragraph.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I suggest that the whole letter be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The whole letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[U. S. S. Exhibit 61.]

(R. W. Archbald, judge, United States Commerce Court, Washington.)

SCRANTON PA., March 8, 1912.

Mr. CULBERSON. That was not the letter. I wish to have the letter to Mr. Bruce read.

Mr. Manager STERLING. It is a long letter.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is the letter from Judge Archbald to Mr. Bruce in which he says that he proposes to have a conference with him and give him an account of the delay in the decision of the case pending before the Commerce Court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be identified and then read.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. This is the letter.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is all right, then.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. It is the letter. The misunderstanding arises from the fact that there appears at the top of the letter, "R. W. Archbald, judge, United States Commerce Court, Washington," and the Senator evidently thought it was not the letter.

Mr. Manager NORRIS. That is a part of the letterhead.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the whole letter, then, be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SCRANTON, PA., March 8, 1912.

MY DEAR MR. BRUCE: I thank you for your letter and its kind appreciation of the opinion of the court in the New Orleans Board of Trade case; but you fail to take credit for the very important part which you played in the result. Frankly, the case was won on your argument and brief. Your oral argument was one of the best that we have heard, and your brief was an absolute demonstration of the errors committed by the commission and complete at every point. You can not fail to note how closely the opinion follows and reflects what is there said.

As for myself, I am only entitled at the most to a part of the opinion as filed. A considerable portion of it, if not indeed the best, is from the hand of another member of the court, and it is probably there that you find the enunciation of principles which you particularly commend. I regret exceedingly the delay which has occurred in this case; but some time, when I have the pleasure of seeing you again, I will endeavor to explain how it came about.

Very truly, yours, R. W. ARCHBALD.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is what I want an explanation of.

The WITNESS. I did not intend in that letter to suggest that there would be a proposed conference, using that term. I expected and hoped some time in the future to meet him, and then I would endeavor to explain the delay which had occurred in filing that opinion, which was not attributable to myself. The rest of the letter was in response to the kind things he had said about the opinion, attributing it to my hand, and I endeavored to respond in kind with regard to his brief.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to have the question again asked and answered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the question.

Mr. CULBERSON. I want the explanation of the delay which was supposed to have been made.

The WITNESS. Very well. I will answer that direct now, if I may. The delay was not due to myself. The delay was due to the endeavor to get the court to harmonize its views as nearly as possible, and with the hope that eventually we might get together upon that. The case was virtually decided when we met in consultation on October 21, and, so far as I was concerned, I was ready to have an opinion filed at that time. Very shortly after that time, so far as I was concerned, the opinion was complete, but it was left to the president of the court to make some changes, which it was supposed would reconcile some differences of views. Therefore a great many things were taken out of my opinion and some others were put in, until it arrived at the form in which it was filed, but none of that delay, as I conceived, was due to myself.

Mr. NELSON. I submit the following question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota propounds a question to the witness, which will be submitted to him by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Was the opinion you prepared in favor of Mr. Bruce's clients in the case?

The WITNESS. The dissenting opinion, which is the basis of the opinion as now filed, was in favor of Mr. Bruce's client, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, and that was the decision which was finally made.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I wish to ask another question in this connection.

Mr. Manager STERLING. On that point—that is, the final opinion of the court——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas will withhold the question for a moment?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) In connection with this I understand now the opinion which was finally rendered in the case was in favor of the railway company that was represented by Mr. Bruce?—A. Yes; that is true.

Q. And it supported the contentions of that side of the case all through?—A. No; not all the contentions.

Q. Practically; the main points?—A. The controlling points; yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas propounds a question which will be submitted to the witness by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Did you think it proper to explain privately to counsel in a case the difference between the members of the court?

The WITNESS. No; I should not. I never had met Mr. Bruce with regard to the matter since that time. I never have had the opportunity to talk over the matter, and I certainly would not go so far as to betray any of the confidences of the consultation room. I simply would have stated what I state here, that, so far as I was concerned, the delay was not due to myself.

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) Judge, the first opinion prepared by the court—agreed to by the court, excepting yourself—was against Bruce's client, was it not?—A. There was no opinion prepared.

Q. Well, the views of the court?—A. In our consultation, in May, the views of the court were against Mr. Bruce's client, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad.

Q. To whom was the duty assigned of writing the opinion?—A. Judge Knapp.

Q Did he write it?—A. He did not.

Q. But before it was written this correspondence took place?—A. The first correspondence, yes; the letter along in, I think, August or September of 1911.

Q. And was it not due to the suggestions which you made, and which you got from the argument and letters of Mr. Bruce, that caused the court to take it up for further consideration, which resulted in reversing the former opinion of the court?—A. No; that is absolutely not so, for, as I wanted to point out, and have endeavored to point out, it is assumed in the opinion that exactly what was contended on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission with regard to Mr. Compton's testimony was the fact.

Q. Have you the opinion there?—A. I have.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I should like to suggest to counsel on the other side that the opinion go right in the record.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. We have noted it to put it in evidence when the time comes, and it might as well go in now as at any other time.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I suggest that it be offered now as evidence.

The WITNESS. I should like to refer to that part of the opinion——

Mr. Manager STERLING. I do not care to pursue it further. I want to call your attention to article 6. We offer the opinion in evidence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it to be read at this time?

Mr. Manager STERLING. No, sir.

The opinion referred to is as follows:

[U. S. S. Exhibit 100.]

Before Knapp, presiding judge, and Archbald, Hunt, Carland, and Mack, judges.

[Feb. 28, 1912.]

Archbald, judge:

A brief history of this case will aid in understanding the questions to be decided. For a number of years prior to 1907 the through rates on certain classes of freight over the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, the present petitioner, from New Orleans, La., to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville, Ala., were higher than the rates on the same classes from New Orleans to Mobile, an intermediate point, plus the rates from Mobile to Montgomery and the other places mentioned. The through rates from New Orleans to these places were also similarly higher than the rates to Pensacola plus the rates from there to the same destinations, the two situations in this respect being identical.

This somewhat peculiar condition was brought about, as it is alleged, by the fact that the rates from New Orleans to Mobile and Pensacola were made lower than might justly have been charged, as well as lower than the general basis of rates prevailing in that section of the country, because of the necessity for meeting water competition between these places; from which policy it resulted, as is to be gathered from the record, that the rail line of the petitioner greatly increased its tonnage, and eventually secured the bulk of the traffic, the rail rates being continued for a number of years after the water competition had practically been eliminated.

Following, however, the enactment of the Hepburn law in 1906, the Interstate Commerce Commission, in an administrative ruling, which has several times been reaffirmed, announced that through rates in excess of the combination of intermediate rates would be regarded as prima facie unreasonable, and that the burden would be on the carrier to defend them. Subsequently to this, and possibly prompted by it, in June, 1907, the Montgomery freight bureau, on behalf of the commercial interests of that city, filed with the commission a formal complaint against the railroad, alleging that the higher through rates to Montgomery than the combination on Mobile, on certain classes and commodities, subjected Montgomery to undue prejudice and disadvantage, in favor of Mobile, in violation of section 3 of the interstate-commerce act. Influenced by this, no doubt, and by the ruling of the commission referred to, the railroad on August 13, 1907, advanced its rates from New Orleans to Mobile and Pensacola on certain classes of freight, by varying amounts sufficient in each case to make the new combination on Mobile and Pensacola correspond with the through rate to Montgomery. This action of the railroad, coupled with subsequent reductions on a number of articles, by taking them out of their respective classes and giving them special commodity rates, apparently had the effect of satisfying the commercial interests of Montgomery, and nothing further seems to have been done in consequence upon the complaint filed by the freight bureau of that city.

This did not, however, satisfy all parties. For a number of years the rates out of New Orleans had been the subject of agitation by the New Orleans Board of Trade, and at various dates, in October and November, 1907, complaints were accordingly filed with the commission by that body, severally charging that the rates to Mobile and Pensacola as recently advanced by the railroad, and the through rates to Montgomery and the points grouped with or based thereon, were unjust and unreasonable in themselves, as well as in comparison with the rates from Memphis, St. Louis, and Louisville. A restoration of the rates in effect to Mobile and Pensacola prior to August 13, 1907, was thereupon prayed, and a reduction of the rates to Montgomery, so that they would not exceed a combination of the locals by way of these places as thus established. The adjustment of certain commodity rates relatively to St. Louis and Memphis was also asked for.

The railroad duly answered these complaints, denying that the rates in force were unjust or unreasonable, and setting forth in detail the facts and circumstances relied on to justify them. But after answering and before any hearing by the commission had been entered upon, the railroad voluntarily established special commodity rates on a number of articles which had been complained of, thereby making the rates on all articles, or at least on most articles, from New Orleans to Montgomery points, as well as to Mobile and Pensacola, the same as or lower than the rates from Memphis and the other places named to these destinations. This was the undoubted intention of petitioner and appears to have been generally, if not completely, carried into effect.

The three New Orleans cases were heard by the commission together and were disposed of November 26, 1909, in a single report and order. This order, in substance, condemned the advance in rates to Mobile and Pensacola on the classes involved as unjust and unreasonable; directed the restoration of the rates in force prior to August 13, 1907, to these places; declared the through rates to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville, to the extent that they exceeded the sum of the locals by way of Mobile and Pensacola prior to that date, to be also unjust and unreasonable; and prescribed for the future certain maximum rates to be maintained by the railroad for the statutory two-year period. The rates which were so prescribed to Mobile and Pensacola were the same in each case as the rates which had existed prior to the advance made by the company, and the rates to Montgomery were exactly equal to the rates to Pensacola and Mobile as so restored, plus the rates from these places to Montgomery, which remained unchanged; the rates to Selma being made up in the same way, and those to Prattville having the prevailing arbitrary added.

This order, by its terms, was to go into effect February 1, 1910, but was postponed by supplemental orders until April 15, following; prior to which time a bill in equity was filed by the railroad against the commission in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Kentucky, and an application made for a preliminary injunction. This application was heard by three circuit judges on bill and affidavits, and was denied by the court in an opinion by Judge Severens (184 Fed., 118); after which the order of the commission became effective and has since been complied with.

The commission having answered the bill, an examiner was appointed and a large amount of testimony taken on behalf of the petitioner, the entire proceedings before the commission, including the testimony submitted to it, being also under objection made a part of the record. No proof was offered in opposition to this in support of the order, the commission taking the position that having been made after a full hearing, upon due consideration of the issues involved and in the exercise of the authority conferred by the statute, the order was not open to question. Upon the organization of the Commerce Court the case was transferred here, and now comes up for disposition upon final hearing. It has been ably and elaborately argued in all its different phases, but there is only one that it seems necessary to pass upon, and that is, whether the commission, in the order which it has made, has not in a legal sense acted as charged in such an unreasonable manner that its order is invalid, having nothing of substance or persuasive force upon which it can rightly be predicated. This is claimed to result because the reasons assigned in the report either do not justify the conclusion reached or are so at variance with the undisputed facts that effect has plainly not been given by the commission to the evidence which was produced before it; and therefore, as it is put in the petition—repeated frequently in various connections—the "order is unreasonable, unjust, unlawful, arbitrary, and oppressive and in excess of the authority granted and powers conferred upon" the commission by the amended act to regulate commerce. Stated in another form the question is whether this order, tested by the principles recently emphasized by the Supreme Court in Interstate Com. Com. v. Union Pacific R. R., decided January 9, 1912, should not be set aside because there was no substantial evidence to sustain it. That is to say, whether the commission, while in form acting within the authority conferred by the statute, has not in effect disregarded it. And it is to this question that we therefore address ourselves.

In this connection we take occasion to say that if the conditions dealt with in the report of the commission were substantially as they are there described we should have little hesitation in dismissing the petition. For even though in that case it might seem doubtful to us whether the commission had reached a just conclusion, it would nevertheless appear that there was room for differences of opinion, because different inferences were able to be drawn, and in such case the conclusions of the commission should be accepted as to matters thus clearly within its jurisdiction. But the question here is whether the report can fairly be regarded as of that character. On the taking of testimony in the circuit court after the preliminary injunction had been refused the entire evidence before the commission was introduced into the record, and it is to that evidence that reference is made in this opinion unless otherwise stated. That evidence we have read and reread with the utmost care, and it is because of our inability to understand how, on the facts which there appear, the report before us could have been made that the difficulty under which we labor arises.

By the express provisions of the statute (sec. 15) before going on to prescribe future rates the commission must reach the conclusion that the existing rates established by the carrier are unjust and unreasonable. It is the duty and the privilege of the carrier in the first instance to fix the rates to be charged (Inter. Com. Com. v. Chicago Great Western Railroad, 209 U. S., 108, 119), and it is only where, after due notice and a full hearing—whether on complaint of a shipper or upon investigation by the commission of its own motion—it is made to appear that the rate is unjust and unreasonable that the commission is empowered to fix another. The hearing which is so provided for is not a perfunctory one. The carrier is entitled to know and to rely on what is adduced at it, either for or against the existing rate, and the commission is not authorized to disregard it and reach a conclusion not at all justified by it. If the rate attacked is shown to be unjust, it may be abrogated and a new one established. But if that is not the outcome of the hearing and on the contrary it is clearly shown that the rate is not unjust, the evidence as to this can not be put aside, and if it is, and the commission without reference to it proceeds to condemn the rate and to fix another, its action is invalid.

After the most careful consideration, we are forced to conclude that the action of the commission in the present instance is of that character. Having regard to the evidence, the only tangible ground upon which it will be found to rest is the fact that there had been an advance in the rates to Pensacola and Mobile and that the Montgomery rate exceeded the sum of the rates through these points as they stood prior to this increase, making the increase in these intermediate rates the only proof of unreasonableness, not only as to Pensacola and Mobile, but Montgomery also. It is conceded by counsel for the Government that if this were true as to the rates to Montgomery, the order of the commission would be invalid, because it would not be based on the reasonableness or unreasonableness of these rates independently considered. And it is just as clear that if the reduction to Mobile and Pensacola was a mere restoration of the rates previously in force, based solely on the advance made by the railroad, it is equally indefensible. And, taking the case as it stands, there is practically nothing else, as it seems to us, that can be made out of it. Not but that other reasons are given by the commission. But it will be found upon examination, as stated above, either that they are entirely unsupported by the evidence or are involved in such capital mistakes with respect to it, or are in themselves so inconsequential as to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of these rates, that nothing can be consistently predicated upon them. And this we will now endeavor to demonstrate.

The New Orleans-Montgomery rate which has been set aside by the order of the commission was one of very long standing and was established with great circumspection. In 1886 Hon. Thomas M. Cooley, whose attainments are too well known to dilate upon, the first chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, was called upon by the railroads running into what was designated as the southeastern territory to arbitrate and adjust the relative rates from crossing points on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers to certain places, such as Montgomery and others within the section of country roughly described as lying between the Memphis & Charleston Railroad on the north, the Gulf of Mexico on the south, the Chattahoochee River on the east, and the Mobile & Ohio Railroad on the west. He was not to determine specific rates, but their relation to each other. This question had first been submitted to Mr. James R. Ogden, as commissioner of certain associated railroads running into this territory, and after he had passed upon it it was submitted to Judge Cooley, who virtually affirmed Mr. Ogden's rulings. So far as the present comparison is concerned, it is sufficient to note that it was thereby decided that the rates from Louisville, Evansville, Cairo, and other like points on the Ohio River, to Birmingham, Montgomery, Selma, and other points within the defined territory, should be the same; that the rates from East Cairo, Columbus, Hickman, and points on the Mississippi in Kentucky should be 2 cents less; and that the rates from Memphis, Vicksburg, and New Orleans should be 4 cents less. An adjustment of rates was made by the railroads in accordance with this, including those from New Orleans to Montgomery and other points in that section, and these rates were maintained, at least so far as class rates are concerned, until the building of the Kansas City, Memphis & Birmingham Railroad from Memphis to Birmingham, which made a very much shorter line than had previously existed between these cities, when the rates on the first six classes of freight from Memphis to Birmingham were greatly reduced below what they had been, and those from New Orleans to Birmingham were also reduced to correspond relatively, in accordance with Judge Cooley's adjustment.

The reduction from New Orleans to Birmingham, however, proved too great and could not be maintained, and the rates between these places were at first restored to the original figures, and then reduced to an intermediate position; and this brought about a reduction on rates for these classes between New Orleans and Montgomery, Montgomery being intermediate to Birmingham. The final adjustment of these rates was reached in 1896, and as fixed at that time they remained substantially unchanged until 1910, a period of 14 years, when the commission made the order in question.

The original careful determination of the New Orleans-Montgomery rates, in their relation to those from Ohio and Mississippi River points into the same territory, in accordance with the Cooley arbitration; the subsequent readjustment of them upon the building of the Memphis and Birmingham short line; and their long-continued acceptance by the business public, during which time freight moved freely under them; all strengthen the presumption in favor of the reasonableness of these rates, against which there is practically nothing to militate except the previous competitive water rates from New Orleans to Mobile and Pensacola and the combination to be made on them to Montgomery. The conclusion is thus forced and, indeed, is patent on the face of things that the Montgomery through rates as now fixed by the commission are nothing more than the restored competitive Mobile and Pensacola rates plus the previous rates from those places to Montgomery.

There is no change, as it will be noted, in the rates from Mobile and Pensacola to Montgomery. The change in the Montgomery through rate is effected by reducing the rates from New Orleans to the intermediate points named and combining them with the rates from there to Montgomery, the reduction in the New Orleans-Montgomery through rates being exactly the same as the reduction made in the rates to Pensacola and Mobile as to every class except one—class E—where the through rate is reduced 1 cent, as against a 5-cent reduction to Mobile and none at all to Pensacola. This coincidence is too significant to be a mere accident or to fail to reveal the consideration which influenced it. It extends to the through rates to Selma and Prattville, as well as to Montgomery, not only by way of Mobile, but of Pensacola also, an exactitude which it is impossible to account for except upon the ground which has been suggested. Not only is the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the through rates to Montgomery, as fixed by the commission, thus made to depend on the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the Mobile-Pensacola part of them, but they are all obliged to stand or fall on the fact of this coincidence, by which, as conceded by counsel, they are not able to be defended. It is true, as already stated, that there are other reasons assigned by the commission in its report for the reduction in the New Orleans-Montgomery rates, but, with due respect to the commission, they do not bear up under examination.

The relation of rates established by the Cooley arbitration and the disturbance inevitably to result from a disregard of it was pressed upon the commission as strong grounds against the proposed changes. "The Cooley arbitration of 1886," it is said in the report, "has been strongly urged * * * as a reason for the nonreduction of the present advanced rates. This arbitration established a relation of rates as between the several Ohio and Mississippi River crossings, applying upon products from the territory north and west of those rivers destined to southern and southeastern territory, by fixing a basis for making rates from these several basing points to the southeastern territory, with the object of maintaining an equitable relation and equality of the basing rate as between said points on goods transported to southeastern territory, but we do not understand that this arbitration undertook to fix the actual rates for carriage from the several basing points to destinations in this territory. However, if such were the case, the building of new railroads, competition, and other causes forced many departures from the adjustment and the rates made under it, until it has become materially altered, and it is inevitable and proper that it should yield to meet new and changed conditions."

From this, which is all the commission has to say on the subject, it would be supposed that the Cooley award was only a basis of adjustment accepted many years before, but which had come to have little more than historical value. In other words, that it was merely a starting point from which departures were frequently and freely made. If this were so, the commission might properly regard it as of no great importance and certainly as furnishing no substantial obstacle to further modification by the reduction of rates from New Orleans. But the record before the commission, as we read it, does not warrant the inference apparently intended from the statement above quoted. Taken by itself the statement is not literally inaccurate, since it seems that some changes were made at various times in the rates on particular articles by taking them out of their respective classes and giving them special commodity rates, and to such extent as changes of this character were made they may be regarded in a sense as departures from the Cooley arbitration basis.

Moreover, the fact that the complaint of the New Orleans Board of Trade embraced in terms commodity rates as well as class rates, and that there was more or less testimony at the hearing which must have related to commodity rates doubtless accounts for what the commission says upon this subject. But when it is remembered that no change of consequence in class-rate relations had taken place since the original adjustment, except the one heretofore explained, and that the order in question pertains only to class rates from New Orleans, the matter presents itself in a very different aspect. Surely the long continuance of these class rates, which are the basis of the rate structure in that territory, and which must be assumed to have been equitably adjusted as between the various competing towns on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers by the Cooley award, was a valid and persuasive objection to any order which would have a disturbing effect upon the class-rate situation. Nor was the force of this objection appreciably lessened by the circumstance that some articles were taken out of the classes from time to time and given commodity rates. Particularly is this so in view of the fact that the commission's report contains no intimation that class rates from other points should be reduced, clearly indicating that the order in question was not predicated upon any finding or contention that this class-rate adjustment was unfair to New Orleans. When therefore the facts in this regard are fully perceived their important bearing upon the controversy seems evident, and they are not to be dismissed from consideration, as they appear to be by the commission, on the mistaken view that "the building of railroads, competition, and other causes had forced departures from the adjustment of rates under it until it had become materially altered, as was inevitable and proper to meet changed conditions," as suggested.

As a further reason for making the order in question the report of the commission contains the following: "It was stated by the principal witness for the defendant that between points on its line where the through rate exceeded the combination of rates from point of origin to a competitive point and from said competitive point to destination shippers were given the benefit of the combination rate, and this provision appeared in special circulars and was very generally observed as a rule for the adjustment of freight rates; and such having been formerly the custom of the defendant, it would seem now to work no especial hardship upon it to reduce rates to the basis of the former combination."

The reference here is to the testimony of Mr. C. B. Compton, the traffic manager of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, who has been with that road in continuous service in various capacities for some 40 years. But a careful reading of his testimony discloses no basis for the statement quoted, if it was meant thereby to imply that the Mobile combination was at any time allowed on through shipments to Montgomery.

On the contrary, it clearly appeared that such shipments had always paid the Montgomery rate, and that the Mobile combination could be secured only by shipping first to Mobile and then reshipping to Montgomery, as seems to have been done in a few instances. Indeed, this is recognized as the fact by the commission, since it is stated in an earlier part of the report that "prior to August 13, 1907, shippers, in order to get the benefit of the lower combination, sometimes shipped locally to Mobile and then reshipped to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville." Of course, if the fact had been otherwise and the road had ordinarily or frequently carried Montgomery traffic on the Mobile combination, the commission might well say that it would be no great hardship to require the carrier to publish in its tariff the actual rates which it habitually accepted; but the undisputed evidence shows that the full Montgomery rate was constantly applied to Montgomery shipments, and we fail to see how that circumstance tended to show that the Montgomery rate was unreasonable.

It is undoubtedly true, as testified by Mr. Compton, that it was a more or less general practice to protect through shipments against the combination of locals, and a rule to that effect was carried by his road in certain of its local tariffs; but there was no such rule in the tariffs naming rates to Montgomery territory, and nothing whatever appeared at the hearing to indicate that through traffic to Montgomery was ever carried at less than the Montgomery rate. A colloquy occurred in the course of Mr. Compton's examination in which he seems to have admitted that the rule in the local tariffs referred to, not being limited in terms, might be claimed to have authorized the application of the Mobile combination to Montgomery shipments. But the point is not what those tariffs might have been construed to mean but what the actual practice was in respect of the traffic in question. Evidently the road was always careful to maintain this Montgomery rate. Everything indicates that it consistently did so. And it seems plain to us that the acceptance on other parts of the system of combination rates which were lower than through rates had no tendency to show that these particular rates were unreasonable. In short, when the undisputed facts regarding this feature of the case, as they appeared before the commission, are taken into account, they not only do not sustain the conclusion of the commission, but seem to be rather of contrary import.

With respect to the through rates from New Orleans to Montgomery as well as the southeast territory generally, it is further said by the commission, in justification of its action, that "It was shown that the merchants of New Orleans have heretofore made ineffectual efforts to secure better rates to this territory, as higher rates were in effect from New Orleans to this territory than existed from distributing centers at greater distances west and north of said territory, the situation being such that New Orleans was cut off from the trade of this section as to many products, and greatly restricted and burdened as to many others, on account of the high rates of transportation."

Tested by the complaints of the New Orleans Board of Trade, which, as above shown, embraced in general terms commodity rates as well as class rates, this statement can not be said to be wholly incorrect. Prior to the adjustments already referred to, and which were voluntarily made by the carrier, months before the order in question was issued, it was perhaps true that New Orleans merchants were at some disadvantage because the class rates from New Orleans on certain articles may have been higher than or out of line with the commodity rates from other points on those articles. But this cause of complaint, to whatever extent justified when the proceedings before the commission were instituted, was substantially if not wholly removed before the hearing was concluded by the reductions and adjustments hereinbefore mentioned, which resulted in actual rates from New Orleans lower on most articles and not higher on any article than rates from Memphis and other points west and north of Montgomery. And this was apparently recognized by the commission to be the case, since it made no order respecting commodity rates. But when the paragraph quoted is tested by the class rates, which are the only ones reduced by the commission's order, it is not only not supported by the testimony, but the contrary is shown by proof that is not open to question. Instead of being discriminated against by the class rates to Montgomery territory, New Orleans has had an actual advantage over the Ohio and upper Mississippi River towns, an advantage over Memphis in the higher classes and at least equality with it in the other classes, and an equality with Huntington, Vicksburg, and the lower Mississippi points to Memphis; all of which is established by comparative tables which stand unchallenged and by the tariffs, as we are advised, then on file with the commission. So far, therefore, from sustaining the action of the commission, the undisputed facts in this regard tend unmistakably to a contrary conclusion.

But the commission also mentions that the rates from New Orleans to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville were higher on all the classes than those from typical points in the Southeast, where the distances were greater, such as Brunswick and Savannah, Ga.; Charleston, S. C.; Wilmington, N. C.; and Nashville, Tenn.; to say nothing of Virginia and North Carolina points, which are referred to in another connection. But in this comparison the commission for its initial points goes over into an entirely different territory. It leaves the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers and goes to the Atlantic coast, in the Carolinas and Georgia, without any suggestion that traffic conditions from there to Montgomery and Selma are at all similar to those from New Orleans, which is the subject of comparison, the only basis of contrast being one of distance. The railroad company in its bill makes complaint of this and avers that the conditions are so dissimilar as to render the comparison unjustified, and that no issue as to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the rates so applied as a standard was made, nor any evidence introduced which was addressed to that inquiry. And this the commission in its answer admits, conceding that there was no fixed relation between the rates from these points and those from New Orleans; which we understand to mean no definite or determining relation.

So also with regard to the rates "from New Orleans to certain stations just outside of Montgomery on the Mobile & Ohio Railroad," which are said by the commission to be less than the rates to Montgomery by the Louisville & Nashville. The bill avers that these were unimportant local points which did not enter into competition with Montgomery; that the traffic to them was insignificant; that no testimony was taken concerning them; and that the Louisville & Nashville Railroad does not publish or participate in or have anything to do with them. And the commission, answering this, admits that the reasonableness of the rates to these local points was not in issue, and that no attempt was made to determine whether or not they were reasonable, and that it did not undertake to determine the reasonableness of the rates prescribed in the order complained of on the basis of the rates referred to. But if all this be so, it is difficult to see why there was any reference made to them at all, or why they were put forward by the commission in the way they were to justify the order, if they had no influence upon it. The effect of the answer, therefore, is to eliminate this part of the report, aside from the other considerations which also do so.

Equally immaterial is the statement that the rates from Virginia cities to Montgomery and Selma are less than from New Orleans, although covering twice the distance, or that those from north Atlantic ports to points in the southeastern territory basing on Montgomery are more favorable, length of haul and number of lines considered, which are some of the minor things entering into the decision. And especially is this to be said of the water rates from New York and Boston to Mobile and New Orleans, which have no perceptible bearing on the rail rates between the latter two places in the connection in which they are cited.

By contrast with this, it might be inquired why the commission in making comparisons took no note of the rates established by the railroad commissions of Alabama and Georgia, which show that for 141 miles, the distance between New Orleans and Mobile, the accepted-as-controlling factor in the situation, the rates by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, which have been condemned and reduced by the commission as unjust and unreasonable, were materially less than the maximum or so-called standard tariff established by the Georgia commission, and much lower still than the rates which were permitted to the Southern Railway in Alabama, Georgia, Tennessee, and South Carolina, as will appear by the comparative table which is reproduced below as taken from the evidence:

	Class—
	1	2	3	4	5	6	E.
Louisville & Nashville rates from New Orleans to Mobile, 141 miles	50	39	38	31	27	16	20
Southern Railway rates fixed by commissions of Alabama and Georgia for 141 miles	75	63	56	44	35	29	35
Minimum or standard tariff of Georgia Railroad Commission, 141 miles	60	50	45	35	28	23	28
Southern Railway rates in Tennessee, 141 miles	58	50	46	37	31	27	32
Southern Railway rates in South Carolina, 141 miles	62	52	42	39	31	24½	31
Southern Railway rates, Chattanooga to Birmingham, 143 miles	57	49	41	32	27	19	27
Southern Railway rates, Birmingham, Ala., to Columbus, Ga., 157 miles	57	49	45	35	28	22	27
Southern Railway rates, Chattanooga to Atlanta, Ga., 138 miles	52	45	41	32	25	20	27

Let us not be misunderstood upon this point. We recognize, of course, that comparisons are very commonly made in the investigation of rate cases, and that they may often be quite persuasive. The competency of such evidence is not questioned nor the right of the commission to give it due weight. Neither is it doubted that the commission may receive evidence of this kind, giving to the facts so shown their proper value, without proof of similarity of conditions. But what we do hold is that the comparisons made by the commission in its report in this case, taking into account all the facts and circumstances disclosed at the hearing, had no evidentiary bearing upon the reasonableness of the rates in dispute, and therefore furnish no appreciable support of the commission's conclusion.

As a further justification for the reduction of the rates to Montgomery the commission suggests that the rate per ton per mile, on an average of the first six classes of freight, is much greater from New Orleans than from Memphis, St. Louis, or Louisville. It is not said, as will be noted, that the rates to Montgomery are higher than from Memphis and the other places mentioned, but that, considering the distance, the rate per ton per mile is greater. But it is the ordinary and recognized rule that the ton-mile rate should decrease as distance increases, other things being equal, and we therefore fail to see how the lower ton-mile rate for the greater distances from Memphis, St. Louis, and Louisville tended in any respect to show the unreasonableness of the rates here in question.

Finally, as a summing up of this part of the case, the commission says: "The manufacturers and shippers of oil, paper, stovepipe, tinware, galvanized tubs, furniture, soap, window glass, paints, hardware, and other articles of like kind in daily use, testified that they were unable to trade in the Montgomery and Selma territory on account of the high rates, and that upon former occasions they had made special efforts to build up a trade with cities located in this territory and points basing thereon, but in every instance they were compelled to abandon the fight on account of better freight-rate concessions from other markets, though at greater distances. With respect to practically all of the commodities above enumerated schedules of comparative rates and distances were filed corroborating complainant's contention."

This statement also can be explained only on the theory that it relates to what the New Orleans Board of Trade alleged in its complaints and to conditions which may have existed in some degree before the road made the reductions and adjustments already mentioned. But having reference to the class rates in question, to which the commission's order is confined, we are unable to find any evidence which tends to sustain the observations made with regard to the inability of New Orleans dealers to trade in the Montgomery-Selma territory.

Take, for instance, the testimony of George P. Thompson, a wholesale grocer of New Orleans, the first witness who has anything to say on the subject. His testimony has mainly to do with Mobile and Pensacola. But being asked by counsel whether it would be possible to increase his business with Montgomery if the rates were adjusted on a fair basis he says that it would, a self-evident proposition, but by no means showing that the rates in force were not what they ought to be. The further statement, which he is led to make by suggestion of counsel, that the rates from Memphis to Montgomery are lower than from New Orleans can not refer to class rates, it being irrefutably shown that they are in fact higher. And the comparison made by counsel in a long leading question with regard to the rates from Baltimore, to which Mr. Thompson gives hesitating assent, is of no more significance than the similar comparison with other North Atlantic points made by the commission, already referred to. It is true that as to certain canned goods, such as beans and peas, he is handicapped, as he says, by the rates from such points as St. Louis and Memphis. But here again the reference must be to commodity rates which have been adjusted, and must have been so understood by the commission, as it does not include peas and beans in the list of articles said to be discriminated against by the rates to Montgomery. And this must also be kept in view when it is said by Mr. Thompson that he is kept out of that territory unless he is willing to absorb a part of the rates, which is not true as to class rates, the only ones which are here in question.

W. O. Hudson, manager of the Marine Oil Co., the next witness, confesses that he knows nothing with regard to the Montgomery-Selma case. Being asked if he could do business in Montgomery if the rate were reduced to 13 cents a hundred, the reduction subsequently made by the commission, he declares that he could not, that the rate would eat him up, the explanation that he gives being that the great bulk of the oil which he handles comes from the Ohio and eastern fields, which are much nearer to Montgomery than he is. Notwithstanding this, and although he is the only witness who testified on the subject, oil is given by the commission as one of the commodities shut out by the high rates from New Orleans into this territory.

E. C. Palmer, a wholesale paper man, admits that business with Montgomery has not been materially injured by the advance in rates, but avers that it will be when his customers understand the situation. He thinks that Nashville has an advantage over New Orleans in the rate on paper (as no doubt it has); and that, as compared with Baltimore, considering the haul, the New Orleans rate is "a little out of line" (although it is not in fact higher); but that, compared with Louisville, it is fair enough. And so far as being kept out of Montgomery is concerned, he says that, on the contrary, he ships there constantly. No one can read the testimony of this witness without being convinced that, except possibly as to Nashville, New Orleans is not only not discriminated against, but has an actual advantage in the rates on paper over every place that it comes in competition with in the Montgomery-Selma territory.

A. D. McBride, a salesman engaged with the National Enameling & Stamping Co., says that he sells goods in Mobile and Pensacola, but not in Montgomery or Selma, because Atlanta, Ga., has lower rates and gets the business. As compared with St. Louis and Louisville he does not see that New Orleans is at a disadvantage, notwithstanding the efforts of counsel to have him say so. The competition which affects him is with Atlanta, and that is the whole of it. Nor even there does he charge that the advantage is an unfair one, but simply that the Atlanta rate to Montgomery is lower and keeps him out of there. Notwithstanding this state of the evidence, however, stovepipe, tinware, and galvanized tubs, the commodities that this witness deals in, he being the only one called to testify with regard to them, are included by the commission among those which it is declared that New Orleans dealers, on account of the high rates, have been unable to sell in the Montgomery-Selma territory, being compelled to abandon the fight, as it is said, after an attempt to build up the trade, a statement as to which there is no approach in the testimony.

J. W. C. Wright, president of the New Orleans Furniture Manufacturing Co., says that Montgomery is not important to them. They ship some furniture there, but have not solicited the trade very strongly; and substantially the same thing is testified by P. Jung, of the Crescent Bed Co., an iron-bed manufacturer.

S. Steinhart, a manufacturer of soap, sells soap in Montgomery, where he says he encounters a rate of only 19 cents from Nashville as against 23 cents from New Orleans; but there is no 23-cent class rate from New Orleans, and he must therefore be referring to a commodity rate, which, as we have already seen, has no bearing.

J. W. Bray, another witness, who is treasurer and manager of the Campbell Glass & Paint Co., says that they are shut out of Montgomery and Selma, the rates being such that they are unable to ship there. But so far as the paint business is concerned, he also says that it is handled entirely from St. Louis, where his company has a house from which they prefer to ship, the rate being more advantageous; and that as to their glass business, Montgomery is not a normal point for it, which hardly makes out that the rates from New Orleans are too high or that he has ever tried unsuccessfully to adjust them.

Harry Moore, who is in the wholesale hardware business, declares that he can not compete with St. Louis, Louisville, and Nashville; but he gives as a reason that, while these places are only one-half the distance from producing centers, such as Pittsburgh and that territory, they pay one-third the rate, and are thus able to get into Montgomery and Selma and places basing on them at much less than he can. But the discrimination here, as is evident, is in the rates from producing centers to the distributing points named, and it is impossible to expect that this should be made up to New Orleans by a back rate to Montgomery that would absorb the difference.

It is difficult, therefore, to see, in view of the testimony of these several witnesses, how furniture, soap, window glass, paints, and hardware were included as they are in the statement by the commission, which has been referred to.

George Weigand, who is in the provision business, and who has been "howling to heaven," as he says, with regard to the rate increase complained of, refers only in this to the rates to Mobile, having never tried to go to Montgomery or Selma.

S. Odenheimer, a manufacturer of cotton goods, makes general complaint of the discrimination in rates from all competitive points where there are cotton mills to Montgomery and Mobile. But it appears from his testimony that there are cotton mills at Montgomery and Mobile as well as at New Orleans, to say nothing of the other places mentioned, and it is altogether unreasonable to expect that rates on cotton manufactures should be put so low that mills at other points shall be able to compete with those actually on the ground. The commission makes no reference to cotton goods in connection with the Montgomery rate, and therefore evidently took this view. Mention was also made by this witness that the rates southerly from Montgomery to New Orleans were lower than those northerly from the one place to the other. But the explanation given him by the company was that there are a good many empty cars going in the direction of New Orleans and none the other way, which might properly justify the distinction.

R. J. Wood, manager of the Gulf Bag Co., manufacturers of burlap bags, testifies that at one time, although not recently, they consigned goods to friends in Mobile to have them reconsigned to other points in Alabama, because the combination on Mobile was less than the rates through there. He also says that the question of the rates from New Orleans to Montgomery and Selma being higher than the combination on Mobile was an old one, and had been up ever since he was connected with the New Orleans Board of Trade, some seven years, complaint being made and efforts put forth to correct it.

All that his company have ever asked, as he says, is the same rates that eastern ports have to points halfway distant to New Orleans, which they have never got, and are therefore at a disadvantage. They have better rates, comparatively speaking, according to this witness, to the Carolinas than to Alabama and Georgia, and there are 18 or 20 points in Georgia to each of which the mileage is less from New Orleans than from New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore, and yet the rates are invariably higher; in consequence of which the Southeast, for his company, is a dumping ground, where they get rid of any overplus, but do not expect to make money. They sell at Atlanta, but make nothing. That city is a bag consumer, but there is a bag concern there, and Atlanta itself complains of New Orleans. This extract from the testimony of this witness is perhaps unnecessary, as the commission does not include burlap or gunny bags among the articles alleged to be discriminated against, so far as concerns the Montgomery-Selma territory. It is only Mobile as to which this is predicated with regard to these articles, and it will be noted that what he says has no application to Mobile.

In this connection a protest, dated August 6, 1902, drawn up by the attorney of the New Orleans Board of Trade, was introduced in evidence before the commission, in which the existence of discriminating rates against New Orleans into the southeastern territory was charged, the fact that the through rate to Montgomery and Selma was higher than the Mobile combination being also mentioned. New Orleans and Mobile, as it is there contended, stand in the same relation to the sources of supply and are competitors to points beyond them, and claim is made that outbound rates from New Orleans should therefore carry but slight differentials. The rest of the paper is mainly an argument why New Orleans should be put on an equality of rates which would permit of competition with New York and Baltimore as well as Georgia, the Carolinas, and Virginia—a broad question not in issue here, as already pointed out, and therefore not relevant or properly to be considered.

This completes the evidence on this branch of the case, and there is no need to dwell on the view to be taken of it. Considered severally or collectively, it contains nothing which we can discover that supports the conclusions of the commission with respect to the Montgomery rates, outside of the fact that, if the reduction is to stand to Pensacola and Mobile, it calls for a reduction to Montgomery to equalize the sum of the locals. It is not simply that the weight of the evidence does not sustain the reasons assigned by the commission in its report, but that there is no substantial basis for those reasons in the testimony passed upon.

The Mobile and Pensacola rates remain to be considered, both on their own account and as the essential basis of the rates to Montgomery. It is to be noted with regard to these that as the law then stood the mere fact that they were increased by the company over what they had been previously creates no presumption that they were not fair and reasonable. (Interstate Commerce Commission v. Chicago Great Western Railroad, 209 U. S., 108.)

Nor did it justify the commission in putting them back to what they had been, without regard to whether that could be properly said of them. But this again is practically all that there is to sustain the commission's action. It is undisputed that these rates to Pensacola and Mobile were the result of severe water competition, and that this had disappeared at the time of the increase. "At the date of the hearing," say the commission, "carriage by water was infrequent and cut but little figure as a competitor" with the railroad. It is also stated that while the rates by rail were generally higher than by water, this was not the case in the third, fourth, and fifth classes, under which the bulk of the freight between New Orleans and Mobile moved; notwithstanding which the commission proceeded to reduce the rates for these classes to what they had been before, actually making them 6, 9, and 8 cents, respectively, below the established water rates as they then stood.

Take also the relative result brought about by the commission's action. It may be that no point should be made of the fact that, taking the rate on first-class goods, which the commission accepts as fair, having made no change in it, the other rates are disproportionately low by comparison. This is the uncontradicted testimony of some of the witnesses, though it may be said that the commission was not bound to adopt their view of it. But that there is a material disparity is observable on the face of things, and also that it breaks in upon the ratio established by the railroad, which was accepted and lived up to all these years—a somewhat significant circumstance. More than that, however, in making the rates on fifth and sixth class goods 35 cents each to Montgomery and 15 cents each to Mobile, while they are 20 and 15 cents, respectively, to Pensacola, the classification is inconsistent, to say nothing of the testimony of some of the witnesses, who assert without contradiction that if 15 cents is correct for the sixth it is too low for the fifth class; while in fixing the rate to Montgomery at 77 cents on second class and 55 on third class—based on a 37 and 25 cent rate to Mobile, respectively—there is a drop of 22 cents, which, according to the undisputed evidence, creates a disproportion between these two classes that is unprecedented in all that territory. And the same is true as to the 12-cent drop between these classes in the rate to Mobile, which is a reduction of 33 per cent on the face of one and 50 per cent on the face of the other, according to the one that is taken for comparison. It is no answer as to any of these Mobile rates that there were the same inconsistencies in the formerly prevailing rates of the railroad. These were competitive rates with respect to which nothing reliable can be predicated without knowing just what produced them. The resort to them for justification in this way merely serves to demonstrate the intimate relation which they bear to the order of the commission.

It is said, however, in the report of the commission that the Mobile and Pensacola rates had remained substantially unchanged for over 20 years, and that there was no evidence that they had not been compensatory. At the time this statement was made the increased rates were in force which were established in 1907, and not the old ones in existence before that. And it was the unreasonableness of these new rates which the complainants in the proceeding had the burden of showing. There was no adverse presumption to be indulged, as we have seen, because of the increase. (Interstate Commerce Commission v. Chicago Great Western Railroad, 209 U. S., 109.) Nor is a voluntary rate, established to met competition, to be taken as the measure of what is reasonable. (Lake Shore R. R. v. Smith, 173 U. S., 684; Frederick v. N. Y., N. H. & H. R. R., 18 Inter. Com. Com. Rep., 481, 484; Breese v. Trenton Mining Co., 19 Inter. Com. Com. Rep., 598, 606.) And yet that in effect is just what the commission did in suggesting in defense of the reduction and restoration which it undertook to make that the previous rates were not shown negatively not to have been compensatory. It was not incumbent on the railroad at that stage to make this out, but on the complainant to show that the rates as they stood were unjust and unreasonable. The position taken here, on behalf of the commission, is that a rate, however low, can not be condemned as unjust if it yield any, the most insignificant, return above the cost of service, a proposition we are not prepared to accede to.

As further justifying the reduction made, it is declared by the commission that the rates to Mobile and Pensacola exceeded the rates from New Orleans to other water-transportation points, such as Natchez, Vicksburg, Greenville, and Memphis, where the distances are greater. This clearly is not true as to Mobile, whatever may be the case as to Pensacola. The rates from New Orleans to the Mississippi River points mentioned, as contrasted with those to Mobile, according to the schedule at the time on file with the commission, will appear by the following table:

	Classes—
	2	3	4	5	6	E
Rates to Natchez, Vicksburg, Greenville, and Memphis..	40	32	25	20	17	15
Rates to Mobile as reduced by the commission.....	37	25	18	15	15	15

It may be that the commission in the statement which it made had the rates in mind as raised by the railroad, as to which, however, it would be true only with respect to the third, fourth, and fifth classes. But that is not the way it is put, nor is it the use made of it in argument, which is that the rates to Mobile as they previously stood and as they were reduced and restored still exceeded those to the other water-transportation points which are mentioned, which is a clear misapprehension.

It is also said by the commission in the same connection that these rates exceed those from Nashville, Memphis, Cincinnati, and Louisville to points approximating the same distance. There is no way of knowing on what this is predicated, there being no reference to any schedules or tables of comparison by which to verify it. Neither is there anything in the evidence before the commission which apparently warrants it. And by contrast, in the evidence taken under the bill which is now before us, it is proved without contradiction that in a large number of instances the fact with regard to the rates from the places named is just the opposite.

Another ground taken by the commission to justify its action is that the rates between New Orleans, Mobile, and Pensacola, until the advance made by the railroad, were identical in both directions, westward as well as eastward, a condition which prevailed, as it is said, between other cities, such as New Orleans, Memphis, Greenville, Vicksburg, and Natchez, and that the raising of rates in the one direction resulted in a disturbance of relations between points where geographic and commercial conditions called for equality. But it has often been recognized by the commission that the mere fact that a rate is higher one way between the same points than it is the other does not prove that the higher rate is unreasonable. (Duncan v. Atch., Topeka & Santa Fe, 6 Inter. Com. Com. Rep., 85, 103; McLoon v. Boston & Maine R. R., 9 Inter. Com. Com. Rep., 642; Weil v. Pa. R. R., 11 Inter. Com. Com. Rep., 627.) And this is particularly true where there is a preponderance of empty cars moving in the one direction, of which there is here some suggestion. There is also some evidence that the rates westward from Mobile to New Orleans are lower than they should be; all of which goes to show that there is practically nothing to be made out of this contention.

It is further said by the commission that the advances made from New Orleans to Mobile in the enumerated classes were severely felt by certain shippers in the former city, especially those engaged in jobbing canned goods, lard, flour, coffee, oil, crackers, pickles, vinegar, beans, etc.; that New Orleans is an important distributing market for canned beans, some 400 to 500 carloads being handled there; and that the increase on this commodity was particularly burdensome, if not practically prohibitory of shipping into New Orleans and out of Mobile. That the advances made in the rates on these classes of goods would be severely felt by certain shippers is not a sufficient reason for holding that they were not what they ought to be. Such an advance would of course be felt, and so would any other change in market conditions which affected the cost of handling. With regard to the other statements made by the commission in this connection, it is undoubtedly true that New Orleans and Mobile are both jobbing points; but so far as concerns beans, they get their supply from practically the same markets and at the same freight rates. In this respect they are rivals; and it is altogether out of line to expect that the rates on beans from New Orleans to Mobile should be so reduced that the jobbers in New Orleans can compete with those in Mobile, and thus invade the latter's own home market.

A counter protest from the jobbers in Mobile, if this were done, would be in order as a matter of self-protection and would have to be listened to. The same is true with respect to the other commodities named, as it is also with regard to paper, stovepipe, tinware, tubs, and galvanized-iron tubs, as to which, according to the commission, the advance in rates made by the railroads would have to be absorbed by the manufacturers.

The evidence with regard to all this is not in conflict. Take, for example, the testimony of George P. Thompson, president of the New Orleans Grocers' Association, which has already been referred to in connection with the rate to Montgomery. He has been selling canned goods, crackers, and baking powder at Mobile for a number of years, as he says, and the advance in rates, according to his statement, has affected him materially. There has also been a serious falling off in peas and beans, particularly the black-eyed beans which are dried in bags, the best coming from California. Mobile, as he says, is a large consumer of these for export and otherwise, and if New Orleans is shut out from there it means a control of the bean business by the railroad. But he admits that Mobile can buy beans from California as cheaply as he can and that the rate from there to each of these two cities is the same. And he therefore, when you come to analyze it, simply wants the local rate from New Orleans to Mobile kept down to a point where he can have a chance to compete at Mobile or places basing on there with the Mobile jobber on the same product. So also with regard to canned goods, baking powder, candles, etc., the rates on which from Memphis to Mobile are shown to be less than from New Orleans; the comparison so made is of no particular significance without a consideration of how the rates from Memphis happen to be what they are (whether these rates are class or commodity) and why that city enjoys this apparent advantage. Mr. Thompson also speaks of New Orleans as a great distributing port for olive oil and coffee, and thinks that recognition should be given it on outbound rates accordingly; but except that Mobile buys oil from New Orleans he makes no application of his statement.

W. O. Hudson, manager of the Marine Oil Co., says he is forced into competition at Mobile with oil from the Ohio oil field, from whence also he gets his supply from the National Refining Co., which has refineries at Cleveland, Marietta, and Findlay. He stocks up for Mobile from there, but it would suit him better to do so from New Orleans, which would relieve him from the necessity of carrying so many men, and where his facilities are greater. These purely personal considerations have no bearing, of course, on the reasonableness of these rates, which are not to be fixed to accommodate any particular person's business.

There is but one witness, Mr. E. C. Palmer, who has anything to say about the paper industry. Testifying eight months after the advance in rates had gone into effect, while he feels that it may be injurious when his customers get onto the idea, he admits that so far it has not been so. His concern also is only as to goods going through Mobile to points beyond and not as to Mobile proper, although he does business there. New Orleans, as he says, is the principal distributing point in the South for newspaper material, competing with St. Louis, Cincinnati, and Nashville, but having an advantage in rates, as a rule, from western points of manufacture, the rates to New Orleans and to Mobile being equal. There would seem to be nothing calling for relief in this situation.

So, also, with reference to stovepipe, tinware, tubs, and galvanized tubs, Mr. McBride, of the National Enameling Co., says that the manufacturers have not been compelled to absorb the advance, as stated by the commission, although he thinks it probable in the end that they may have to do so. Prices have been increased to the extent of the advance, but no one in Mobile has declined to buy on account of it. It simply has increased the cost to the jobber, and he in turn sells higher to the retailer. He admits that the New Orleans manufacturers still have a lower rate to Mobile than any other point with which they come in contact; but the difference is slight, and it would take but a small advance to equalize it. The trade at Mobile has been accustomed to buy goods delivered, and it is going to be difficult, as he says, to get the increase from them in the future, although the New Orleans manufacturer is now doing so. Under normal conditions the manufacturers would have to absorb the advance and keep the Mobile jobber on a par with others, but now it is done by the jobber.

There is nothing in any of this to sustain the findings of the commission which have been referred to, or to justify the reduction which it has ordered. The rates to Mobile were so low before that the manufacturers in New Orleans could afford to absorb them and did so. They can not, perhaps, afford to do so now. And because the Mobile jobber has become accustomed to get his goods free the manufacturers in New Orleans anticipate trouble. But this is a possibility which the railroad can not be required to prevent, and the situation as disclosed by this witness indicates that the former rate was certainly low.

Again, the commission makes the statement that the advance in rates on furniture, iron beds, etc., had practically closed out the business with Mobile in these articles, better rates being made on them from other manufacturing points, such as Atlanta, Ga., and High Point and Winston Salem, N. C. This is a clear mistake of fact, due no doubt to inadvertence, but none the less serious, it being the uncontradicted evidence that, with one single exception, where the rate from Atlanta to Mobile is a cent lower than from New Orleans, all the rates on all the articles named from the three places mentioned are not only higher, but very materially higher, than from New Orleans. It is true that, according to Mr. Wright, there is a restrictive loading rule with regard to furniture from New Orleans to Mobile which is not imposed as to Nashville and Memphis. But this does not apply to any other points, and while it apparently gives some advantage to Memphis over New Orleans, Nashville is simply put on an equality with it. It is to this rule, also, and to the changed classification of mixed furniture in carloads, that he ascribes his loss of trade rather than to the present rate advances.

The testimony of P. Jung, another iron-bed manufacturer, is even less to the purpose. He says he never sought the Mobile field nor made any effort to get into Pensacola and has not been affected by the advance in rates to these places. Before the advance he solicited business throughout Alabama and Georgia, but found that he would have to guarantee rates as against Atlanta, High Point, and Winston-Salem, and that the trade did not warrant it. Evidently the increase did not harm nor would the reduction help him.

This is all the evidence there is as to furniture and iron beds, and it is clear that it does not in any particular support the statement of the commission.

It is further said, however, by the commission that the advance in rates on bags, burlap, gunny, and jute was vigorously opposed, and a strong protest also made on account of the alleged discrimination against New Orleans in cotton goods, it being asserted that other manufacturing points were given more favorable rates. This is sought to be sustained as to cotton goods by a comparison of rates from Virginia and North and South Carolina points, as well as from Augusta, Ga., and even from New York and Boston. The suggestion that the advance was vigorously opposed or that a strong protest was made affords neither evidence nor argument. This is always to be looked for where there is an increase in prices, whether warranted or unwarranted. Nor is anything more to be made out of the rate comparison. The commission does not say that the rates to Mobile on cotton goods are less from other manufacturing points than from New Orleans, which is not the fact, as is demonstrated by the evidence, but only that the rates are more favorable. But this is based on the mere matter of distance, which is no criterion, as already stated, without the consideration of other attending conditions. As pointed out also in connection with the Montgomery rates—according to the testimony of Mr. Odenheimer, on which this part of the case is evidently based—there are cotton mills both at Mobile and Montgomery, as well as at the other competing points named, and it is not to be expected that rates on cotton goods should be put so low that New Orleans manufacturers would have an advantage over all others in that territory beyond what they already have; which would be the rankest discrimination. And the matter of burlap and gunny bags is not much different. The testimony of Mr. R. J. Wood is directed to this and has already been considered in another connection. So far as Montgomery and Pensacola are concerned, he frankly says that the advances have not injured his business. His complaint is as to points beyond, with regard to which he has not a little to say, but it has been discussed above and there is no occasion to again go over it.

This completes the case as to Mobile; and that with regard to Pensacola, except that it is still weaker, is no different. It is said by the commission that the advance in rates "was not so heavy or so injurious to the merchants in New Orleans in their trade with Pensacola as the advance to Mobile, but they strongly protested against it, and it was shown that, proportionately, like conditions resulted from the advance as were produced by the increase in rates to Mobile." But there is nothing to sustain this statement. One witness, Mr. Palmer, a paper dealer, says that he would be affected in Pensacola the same as Mobile; but he is not affected at all at Mobile and can not, therefore, be at Pensacola. Another, Mr. Steinhart, who deals in soap, says that they get no orders from Pensacola because the rate is said to be so high; and what he wants and thinks the company should come down to, as he is not slow in saying, is a 10 or 12 cent rate, the same as on rice and sugar, which is hardly to be expected. The other witnesses called, to a man, declare either that they have no complaint to make or that their business at Pensacola is slight or that they have not been affected; and yet the commission finds with regard to the trade with Pensacola what has just been stated.

Opposed to the evidence which has been thus referred to—if there can be said to be any opposition to what is so irrelevant and wanting in persuasiveness on the question as to what is reasonable—there are several witnesses produced by the railroad company of large experience, who testify that the rates prescribed by the commission, both to Mobile and Pensacola, as well as to Montgomery, are unjust and unfair, under all the circumstances, and among others, because they are less than those usually and ordinarily charged by the company, as well as by other railroads for the transportation of like classes of property between other points in the South separated by similar distances; because the rates which were cut down permitted a free movement of traffic and there were no competitive or commercial conditions calling for a reduction; and because the rates as reduced would give to New Orleans an undue and unreasonable advantage and preference over Vicksburg, Memphis, and other Mississippi and Ohio crossings, and would disrupt and destroy the relative adjustment and the general system of rates which have prevailed in the southeastern territory ever since the Cooley arbitration. It is also indisputably shown that the New Orleans-Mobile line along the Gulf coast is exceptionally difficult and costly to operate; that a considerable portion of it consists of long trestles and bridges which are subject to extraordinary damage and sometimes to a complete destruction by floods and freshets in the streams which they span; that its proximity to the Gulf lays it open to the full force of the Gulf storms and hurricanes, by which it was entirely put out of business for nearly a month in the early fall of 1909, and for considerable periods at different times previously; that the intermediate territory traversed is so sparsely settled and its freight traffic so small that the successful and profitable operation of the line is necessarily dependent on the through traffic between New Orleans and Mobile and points beyond, in consequence of which the company has never received even a fair return from its operations; and finally, that the cost of operation by reason of the increase in wages, in maintenance, and in the price of locomotives, cars, and other matters of equipment, has grown so enormously in the last few years that to go back to rates established under earlier conditions, when there was active water competition, instead of being fair and reasonable, is to work great and manifest injustice in disregard and in the face of this undisputed showing.

There was no attempt to meet the case as so made out for the company either by way of argument or otherwise. Counsel for the commission and for the Government simply rely on the authority of the commission to determine what is a reasonable rate and the conclusiveness of its judgment where it has done so, against which, it was argued, the courts can afford no relief unless the rate which has been fixed is shown to be confiscatory. But this contention, as presented and sought to be applied in the case at bar, must be rejected. In our judgment, it was never intended to confer on the commission any such unrestrained and undirected power. As already pointed out, the law provides for a hearing, and it must be more than a shadow. Both parties are entitled to be confronted with the evidence on which the case is to be determined, and the conclusion reached must be a reasonable inference from the facts disclosed by the investigation. This construction of the commission's authority and the conditions which limit its exercise appear to us clearly and definitely settled by the recent decision in Interstate Com. Com. v. Union Pacific R. R., supra, which is the latest and fullest utterance of the Supreme Court in a case of the same general class as the one now under consideration. Tested by the principles laid down in that decision, we are of opinion that the order here drawn in question must be held invalid as exceeding the delegated powers of the commission, because there was no substantial evidence to sustain it. It is not merely that the evidence preponderates in favor of the reasonableness of the rates which have been cut down. Concededly, that would not be enough to challenge the action of the commission. Not only is the commission vested with a discretion which can not be disturbed, and which we intend unqualifiedly to respect, but it is entitled to select the testimony which it will believe and rely upon, according as it addresses itself to the discriminating judgment of the commission. But it is not within the authority of the commission to reduce the rates in this or any other case, not merely against the weight of the evidence produced to sustain them, but without anything substantial to warrant the conclusion reached or the reasons assigned therefor. And this we are convinced is a case of that character. The only discoverable basis for condemning the rates to Mobile and Pensacola is the fact that they had been advanced in 1907, and this of itself was clearly not sufficient. (Interstate Com. Com. v. Chicago Great Western, 209 U. S., 108.) If the long continuance of lower rates to these points or the circumstances connected with their increase called for explanation, as suggested in the case cited, the explanation made by the carrier, in the absence of anything to discredit it, must be held to sustain the advance as against any presumption that it was unreasonable, and therefore there was nothing substantial to support its condemnation. Nor is there anything of substance to sustain the reduction of the Montgomery rates except the fact that they exceeded the former combination on Mobile and Pensacola. Outside of these facts, having regard to the undisputed evidence adduced at the hearing, the existing rates were not shown to be unjust or unreasonable, and there was therefore no valid basis for the commission's conclusion.

And the petitioner is therefore entitled to a decree annulling the order.

Mack, judge, dissents.

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) You had some further negotiation with Mr. Warriner, of the Lehigh Valley Co., did you not?—A. I went to see him once after that; yes.

Q. And you talked to him then about the coal-land transaction, did you not?—A. Well, hardly that.

Q. You tried to sell to him the Everhart interest in 800 acres of land?—A. Absolutely not.

Q. You talked with him about it?—A. No; I will go into that if you desire.

Q. Did you talk with Warriner about the Everhart interest in 800 acres of land?—A. The Lehigh Valley——

Q. Did you talk with him about it?—A. About the interest of what?

Q. About purchasing the Everhart interest in 800 acres?—A. No; not the way you put it.

Q. In what way did you talk with him about it?—A. The Everharts had leased two pieces of property to the Lehigh Valley Coal Co.

Q. No; I am not asking you for facts. I am asking you what was said to Mr. Warriner?—A. I can not tell you what was said without giving the facts about what was said.

Q. Just state the substance of the conversation that you had with Warriner about that.—A. I spoke to Mr. Warriner about the Lehigh Valley leases, the one with regard to 400 acres, which, I think, was known as the 1884 lease, and the one with regard to 800 acres, which was known as the 1888 lease. In the 1888 lease the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. had bought out——

Q. Did you tell him that?—A. That is what we were talking about.

Q. Go ahead and state the conversation.—A. I had to refer to something as the basis of the conversation. The Lehigh Valley Coal Co. had bought out all but one of the Everhart heirs—Mrs. Llewellyn, of Philadelphia—and, according to my information, they had endeavored to negotiate a sale from her for a definite price, the same they had paid the others, $100,000, and they had not been able to effect it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, before we pass from the Bruce argument I desire to ask another question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas propounds a question which will be read to the witness by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

In one of your letters you say that the opinion in the Bruce case reflected the argument of Mr. Bruce. What argument did you refer to, the oral argument or the private-letter argument? What effect did this last argument have upon you?

The WITNESS. I referred entirely to the oral argument and to the printed brief which was submitted at that time. It was certainly a very fine argument and a very fine brief. That statement had nothing whatever to do with what was contained in the answer to my letter of the 10th of January. That letter had no effect, absolutely none, upon the decision of the case.

Mr. CULBERSON. What did you write it for, then?

The WITNESS. I wrote it on account of——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator must submit his question in writing.

Mr. CULBERSON. Since I am handicapped in the examination I will take the liberty of asking the manager to put the question, if I may be permitted.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I will ask it. [To the witness:] Just answer the Senator's question. What did you write it for if it did not have any effect?

The WITNESS. It simply was, as you might say, to meet the argument that had been made by Judge Mack with regard to what are known as variations from the Cooley award. Judge Mack was assuming the position of dissent, and that was one matter that he raised. It only enters incidentally into the decision of the case, very incidentally. It was simply to get his views. It was something that had arisen entirely outside of the argument, and, as I said, the case could have been disposed of entirely without reference to that. But in writing the opinion it was deemed necessary to cover that point. That point was covered. As I said, I did not write that part of the opinion any more than I wrote the part in regard to the testimony of Mr. Compton.

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) Judge, you did use it for the purposes for which you got it? You used it to meet Judge Mack's views, did you not? You say you got it to meet Judge Mack's argument and you used it for that purpose?—A. I do not remember that I did. I do not remember that I discussed the matter with Judge Mack at all.

Q. You did not use it for the purpose for which you got it, you say?—A. I do not think I did.

Q. Did you tell Judge Mack you had this correspondence with Bruce?—A. No.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I send a question to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri propounds a question, which will be submitted to the witness by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Why did you not give the attorneys on the other side a chance to present their views?

The WITNESS. Because the point in the case amounted to so very little. It did not enter into the decision of the case practically at all. It was not a controlling question. It merely came up incidentally.

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) If it was so insignificant why did you take the trouble to write to Bruce about it? It was as important to the other side of the case as it was to Bruce's side of the case, was it not?—A. Yes; it was just as important to one side of the case as to the other.

Mr. NELSON. I present the following question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota propounds a question, which will be submitted to the witness by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

You set out to write an opinion in favor of the railroad company and you wanted Mr. Bruce to fortify you in this, did you not?

The WITNESS. No; I do not think that what I did could be characterized that way.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask another question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri submits a question, which will be propounded to the witness by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

How would you characterize it?

The WITNESS. I can go into a full explanation. I do not think I can answer that question in a word. As I have said, so far as the first letter was concerned the position taken in the opinion entirely disregards the suggestions of that letter with regard to the testimony of Mr. Compton, and so far as the second letter is concerned with regard to the variations from what are known as the Cooley award, that matter is dealt with in that part of the opinion by Judge Knapp.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I have a question to propound on the same subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas propounds a question, which will be submitted to the witness.

The Secretary read as follows:

Why did you not give the Bruce letters to your associates on the bench?

The WITNESS. Because, as I said, they practically did not enter into the decision of the case or control or influence the decision in the case.

Mr. REED. I send the following question to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri propounds a question, which will be submitted to the witness.

The Secretary read as follows:

If the information you requested was immaterial, why did you request it?

The WITNESS. It seemed to be material at the time, but it did not prove so in the end.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I submit a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia submits a question, which will be propounded to the witness by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Did you obtain the aid of Mr. Bruce to prepare a dissenting opinion, and, after obtaining his aid, bring the majority of the court over to your view of the case without disclosing the fact either to opposing counsel or the court that you had been corresponding with Mr. Bruce?

The WITNESS. I wrote the dissenting opinion, which I did solely upon my own views and study of the case. Certainly I did not write that dissenting opinion with any conference with Mr. Bruce or any correspondence, except just the one letter, which has been put in evidence. I had reached a conclusion with regard to the testimony of Mr. Compton the same as Mr. Bruce speaks of in his letter. With regard to that, I simply wanted a confirmation of that view. As I said, it is a very inconsiderable point in the case, only one of very many.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I send to the desk a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri submits a question, which will be propounded the witness by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

When did you conclude that the information you sought from Mr. Bruce was immaterial?

The WITNESS. In talking the matter over with Judge Knapp I saw that there was no occasion to dwell upon that point of the case. The time, really, when Judge Knapp and I talked the matter over, after it had been decided that we would render a decree in favor of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad——

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I send a question to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana propounds a question, which will be submitted to the witness by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Was it after you received the letter from Mr. Bruce that the dissenting opinion which you prepared became in substance the opinion of the court?

The WITNESS. It was after the first letter which I received, along in the summer of 1911, that my dissenting opinion, or the substance, became the basis of the opinion of the court.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I submit a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington submits a question, which will be propounded to the witness by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

If the information sought seemed material when you asked for it, did it not occur to you to advise other counsel or your associates of your desire to secure it?

The WITNESS. It did not, or I should have done so.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I submit a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio submits a question which will be propounded to the witness.

The Secretary read as follows:

If it was such an inconsiderable point about which you wrote to Mr. Bruce, why was it necessary to meet the views of Judge Mack on this point?

The WITNESS. Well, when there is one member of the court sustaining a certain line of views they become the subject of discussion very naturally and necessarily. I never regarded, if I may be permitted to say so here, that the point upon which Judge Knapp eventually dissented really was of any significance in the case. I am characterizing the opinion of my associate in a way in which I would not do except for the question. It was necessary to say that in order to answer the question.

I should like very much, if I could be permitted, to explain this whole thing, because I feel satisfied that if I could it would show the Senate more fully what I have endeavored to show in answer to these questions.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I send a question to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri propounds a question which will be submitted to the witness by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Did you communicate to your associates in argument the views set forth in the Bruce letters?

The WITNESS. No; those were the arguments with regard to the Cooley award, which was the matter spoken of in the letter of January 10. Those were advanced in answer to Judge Mack by Judge Knapp, without reference to anything that appeared in my letter or without any suggestion on my part. They were the natural and obvious answer, as it seemed to me, to the position taken by Judge Mack.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the witness said he desired to explain my question. My question is directed to that request.

Mr. POMERENE. I have a question, and it was directed to the same point.

The WITNESS. I will be as brief as I possibly can. The questions involved in the Louisville & Nashville case were the reduction of class rates which had been ordered by the Interstate Commerce Commission from New Orleans to Mobile and Pensacola, and through Mobile and Pensacola to Montgomery and beyond. Those rates, so far as the rates from New Orleans to Mobile and Pensacola are concerned, had been established, as it was claimed by water competition, at a very low point by the railroads.

The rate from New Orleans to Montgomery would ordinarily be made up by the rates from New Orleans to Mobile or to Pensacola plus the rates from either of those two places to Montgomery and beyond. It so happened—and this was the complaint against the rates of the railroad—that the through rate from New Orleans to Montgomery was greater than the combination on those two places or than the sum of the locals. That complaint having been made to the commission, the railroad company then raised its rates to the intermediate points, so that the sum of the locals would equal the through rate to Montgomery.

It was that controversy in that case that came up before the Commerce Court. The main contention before the Commerce Court—the one controlling contention—was that the Interstate Commerce Commission had no evidence before it—not evidence on which there might be a difference of views, but practically no evidence—to sustain the conclusions which they had reached, which were involved in the decision of that question and that case, and also that they not only had no evidence, but that they had mistaken the evidence. On the part of the Government and the Interstate Commerce Commission it was contended that the court was not authorized to go into that question at all. That was the position assumed by them, and was their main contention.

The view that I took originally with regard to that was in line with the argument made by Mr. Bruce at the time the case was originally made, that there was practically no evidence to justify the conclusion of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission in the opinion which they rendered—a copy of which I have here in my hand and which I should like to go into the RECORD—gave sundry reasons for this decision. There were two matters in that opinion about which the two letters written to Mr. Bruce are concerned, and I will refer to them in their order. I should like to read this extract from the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission at this point, bearing in mind that the question for us to decide, the contention on the part of the railroad company that there was no evidence—substantially no evidence—a conclusion which was finally reached in the opinion of the majority of the court. This is the extract:

It was stated by the principal witness—

This is one of the reasons, and the only reason, given by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the order which they made—

It was stated by the principal witness for the defendant that between points on its line where the through rate exceeded the combination of rates from point of origin to a competitive point, and from said competitive point to destination, shippers were given the benefit of the combination rate, and this provision appeared in several circulars and was very generally observed, as a rule, for the adjustment of freight rates; and such having been formerly the custom of the defendant, it would seem now to work no especial hardship upon it to reduce rates to the basis of the former combination.

That is to say, it is asserted in that opinion that there existed a rule with respect to the rates involved in the controversy in that case, by which parties shipping from New Orleans to Montgomery would be given the benefit of the combination and reduced in that way on through rates. As a matter of fact, there is not anything in the opinion that sustains that view; that is to say, that was the view which I took in my dissenting opinion, and that is the view that was taken eventually in the opinion of the court; but regardless of that conclusion, here is what the court said upon that point in its opinion——

Mr. WORTHINGTON. The Commerce Court?

The WITNESS. The Commerce Court.

It is undoubtedly true—

Now, this, mind you, was written by Judge Knapp—

It is undoubtedly true, as testified by Mr. Compton—

He was the witness spoken of here as "the principal witness," the traffic manager, I believe, he was, of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad—

It is undoubtedly true, as testified by Mr. Compton, that it was a more or less general practice to protect through shipments against the combination of locals, and a rule to that effect was carried by his road in certain of its local tariffs; but there was no such rule in the tariffs naming rates to Montgomery territory, and nothing whatever appeared at the hearing to indicate that through traffic to Montgomery was ever carried at less than the Montgomery rate. A colloquy occurred in the course of Mr. Compton's examination, in which he seems to have admitted that the rule in the local tariffs referred to, not being limited in terms, might be claimed to have authorized the application of the Mobile combination to Montgomery shipments. But the point is not what those tariffs might have been considered to mean, but what the actual practice was in respect to the traffic in question. Evidently the road was always careful to maintain this Montgomery rate.

I wrote my dissenting opinion. In looking over the testimony, of which I made the abstracts which I have here in my hand—a very voluminous record—I reached the conclusion with regard to Mr. Compton's testimony contrary to that which appeared in the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I wanted to make sure about that, and I wrote the letter which I have written, the first letter, to Mr. Bruce, to ascertain whether the view which I took of that, which depended upon whether the word "not" had or had not been omitted, was correct; and he sustained me in that view; but as I read the opinion as it is now formulated, that matter was put entirely aside, and it was assumed that what Mr. Compton had said was what the Interstate Commerce Commission say that he said, because, reading again, I find this:

A colloquy occurred in the course of Mr. Compton's examination in which he seems to have admitted—

It seems to me Mr. Compton did admit—that the rule in the local tariffs referred to, not being limited in terms, might be claimed to have authorized the application of the Mobile combination to Montgomery shipments.

Then he goes on to point out that, notwithstanding that fact, the conclusion reached by the commission upon that point was not correct. That is what was embodied in the first letter.

The second letter goes to this part of the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The whole basis of rates into the southeastern territory by all the railroads running in that direction, covering the rates from what was known as the Mississippi and Ohio River crossing points down into that territory, including the rate from New Orleans into Montgomery territory, had been originally submitted to arbitration by the carriers. Judge Cooley, the first president of the Interstate Commerce Commission, was the arbitrator. As the result of that he established a relation of rates into that territory. That arbitration had stood, according to the contention on the part of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, from that time, away back in 1886, until the controversy arose, which, I believe, was in 1907, a long period of years; and that, in view of that fact, that arbitration was entitled to particular consideration at the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission in reaching the result; and that, in disregard of it, they had put it aside as being nothing more than what might be said of historical value.

This is part of the Interstate Commerce Commission's opinion to which that refers:

The Cooley arbitration in 1886 has been strongly urged by the defendant as a reason for the nonreduction of the present advanced rates. This arbitration established a relation of rates as between the several Ohio and Mississippi River crossings applying upon products from the territory north and west of those rivers destined to the southern and southeastern territory by fixing a basis for making rates from these several basing points to the southeastern territory, with the object of maintaining an equitable relation and equality of the basing rate as between said points on goods transported to southeastern territory, but we do not understand that this arbitration undertook to fix the actual rates for carriage from the several basing points to destinations in this territory.

Here is the significant part:

However, if such were the case, the building of new railroads, competition, and other causes forced many departures from the adjustment and the rates made under it, until it has become materially altered, and it is inevitable and proper that it should yield to meet new and changed conditions.

In other words, the reason given by the Interstate Commerce Commission for disregarding the Cooley award was the suggestion that there had been so many departures from it. That was the position taken also by Judge Mack based upon this: There are class rates and commodity rates. The difference between them I endeavored to explain yesterday. There is a classification of freight, running from first class to sixth class, and some lettered classes. I do not know what enters into that matter, and it is not material.

Then there are commodity rates; that is to say, a lot of commodities grouped together to form a class are put in a class because they have certain relations to each other; but for some reason or other one of these commodities will be taken out of a class and given a specific rate. Those are the commodity rates.

When this matter originated before the Interstate Commerce Commission both class rates and commodity rates were involved; but as a result of that the railroads made the changes in the commodity rates of which complaint was made, so that there was nothing left in the controversy except with regard to class rates; but the position taken by Judge Mack was—and apparently the only justification for the position taken by the Interstate Commerce Commission in that part of the opinion which I have read was—that there had been a variation from the Cooley award in commodity rates which were not involved. Judge Mack examined the tariffs at great length and reported that he found I do not know how many variations in the commodity rates, and he said that justified the statement of the Interstate Commerce Commission which I have particularly referred to:

However—

Reading from the opinion—

However, if such were the case, the building of new railroads, competition, and other causes forced many departures from the adjustment and the rates made under it, until it has become materially altered, etc.

What was said in that opinion related, as I understood and as every one of the members of the court understood, really to class rates, which was the only question involved in the case before the Commerce Court. The matter set up by Judge Mack was that there had been variations in the commodity rates and that that justified the statement. That is the whole issue that there was; and that is the whole question that was referred to in the letter to Mr. Bruce. It only incidentally enters into the result, because it only bears upon one of the reasons that the Interstate Commerce Commission gave for its opinion. It might have been entirely disregarded and the result reached be practically the same as it was. As I have said, I think that is reflected entirely in the opinion where the matter of the Cooley award is treated. The obvious answer is that you can not base a variation from the Cooley award on commodity rates as bearing upon whether there had been a variation from the Cooley award with regard to class rates.

That is all there is to it; that is what is said in the opinion; and, as I have said, that view is the view that was advanced by Judge Knapp and coincided in by the rest of the court, and is what appears in the opinion. I had no more influence in bringing about that view than other members of the court; and the views that were advanced by Mr. Bruce in his letter were not communicated to the other members of the court. It seemed to me that it was only in justice to Mr. Bruce, this question having been raised entirely outside of the record and not in the argument at all, that if it had any bearing, as I do not think it had in the practical result, he was entitled to have the views that he expressed appear there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] submits a question which he desires propounded to the witness. The Secretary will read the question.

The Secretary read as follows:

Do you as a judge consider it a safe practice to ask the lawyer interested in a particular construction of evidence for his views without giving the opposing attorney a chance to be heard?

The WITNESS. I wish to say emphatically no, coinciding entirely with the view which I consider to be expressed in the opinion. There may be circumstances which might justify that, but it certainly would be very unusual; and I have tried to follow that as a cardinal rule in all my practice and all my experience upon the bench.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. PERKY] propounds a question, which will be read to the witness.

The Secretary read as follows:

In your answer to article 4 of the articles of impeachment exhibited against you, you admit that you requested Mr. Bruce to see one of the witnesses in order to get the witness's explanation of a phase of his testimony. Do you regard this procedure as fair to the opposing side? Does such confidence not invite and encourage imposition?

The WITNESS. Well, my views now, with the light that has been thrown upon the subject, might vary from what they were at the time. I think I may say frankly that if I had supposed there was any unfairness or even any impropriety, my judicial sense and my sense of propriety would have kept me from that. If it seems otherwise to Senators, I regret it; but that is all I can say. It did not seem to me, it did not impress me, in the way that has been suggested here.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I submit a question which I desire to have propounded to the witness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas submits a question, which will be read to the witness by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

As you condemn the reprehensible practice involved in the Bruce correspondence, as I understand you, what explanation of it or excuse for it have you to make to the Senate? State it fully and frankly.

The WITNESS. I do not think that what I have said constitutes or is intended to constitute an admission that, under the circumstances of this case and under the conditions which existed, the practice was reprehensible. I may be obdurate in that opinion. So far as that seems to have been a practice that was reprehensible, or not to be commended by the Senate, I have no further excuse or no further explanation than that which I have endeavored already to give.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The managers will proceed with the examination.

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) Going back to article 6, Judge, you did have a talk with Warriner about the Everhart interest in this 800-acre tract?—A. Yes.

Q. And the purpose of it was to get him to buy their interest in that tract?—A. No.

Q. Well, what was said?—A. He was anxious to buy that interest.

Q. What was said between you and him?—A. I knew, or I understood, that he was anxious to buy that interest. I did not have it to sell, but I understood that Mr. Dainty was on friendly relations with Mrs. Llewellyn, controlling the outstanding interest, and that he possibly could secure that interest for the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. That was what he represented.

Q. What Dainty represented to you?—A. What Dainty represented; yes.

Q. Then did you have him go to see the Everhart interests?—A. No; I did not.

Q. Well, did he go to see them?—A. I do not know.

Q. You and Dainty were connected in the matter, were you not?—A. No.

Q. Why did Warriner then come to you about it, or why did you go to him?—A. He did not come to me.

Q. Did you go to him?—A. I went there and saw him at his office.

Q. Why did you go and see him about it if you were not concerned in it?—A. Simply as a matter that affected Mr. Dainty; so far as it affected Mr. Dainty.

Q. Then you and Dainty were connected in a way with it, were you not?—A. We were connected in the way I have described.

Q. You went just as a friend of Dainty?—A. Practically that.

Q. Was there not an understanding between you and Dainty that you and he were to get the Everhart interest for sale, sell it to the Lehigh Valley Co., and get a commission on it?—A. Absolutely not.

Q. Well, at the same time you talked to Warriner about that, you also talked to him about leasing another tract of 320 acres to Dainty, did you not?—A. Yes; that was the suggestion——

Q. You tried to get from Warriner a lease for Dainty on that, did you not?—A. I suggested that if Mr. Dainty was instrumental in securing the Llewellyn interest for the price which they named—Mr. Warriner said they would absolutely pay nothing but the $100,000; indeed, he said they would deduct the royalties that had been paid to Mrs. Llewellyn, since the other heirs had been bought up, because we did not propose to make any difference or any distinction between her and the others—I suggested that if Mr. Dainty did that, then he would like to lease the Morris & Essex tract.

Q. Did anything come of that conference with Warriner about those two matters?—A. No.

Q. They neither bought the Everhart interest nor rented to Dainty through you the 320-acre tract?—A. No.

Q. How long had you known Dainty?—A. Oh, I had known of him longer than I had actually met him. I had not met him very long before this occurred.

Q. Well, Williams brought him to you, did he not?—A. Yes.

Q. And introduced him to you?—A. I met him and Williams on the street one day.

Q. Did he not come to your office with Williams?—A. He did.

Q. This was just shortly before your conference with Warriner?—A. Yes; not long.

Q. Williams told you what Dainty wanted; but he said to you that he had not told Dainty that you were the only man in Scranton that could get these interests from the railroad company?—A. No; that is not so.

Q. Well, what did he say about that?—A. Mr. Dainty did the talking.

Q. What did Williams say when he introduced Dainty?—A. Mr. Williams brought Mr. Dainty there with the suggestion that he would be able to get the Everhart interest in the Katydid dump.

Q. How were you interested in that? Did Williams know you were trying to get those interests for sale?—A. That was during the negotiations that we were carrying on with regard to the Katydid dump.

Q. Well, how did that bring up the matter of the Everhart interest in the 800-acre tract?—A. I presume Mr. Dainty mentioned that fact; he must have mentioned it.

Q. That was the purpose Williams had in bringing Dainty there—so you could talk about that?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I object to asking the witness what Mr. Williams's purpose was.

Mr. Manager STERLING (to the witness). Well, what did you say to Williams?

The WITNESS. I do not understand what you mean when you ask what was his purpose. I do not know what you refer to.

Q. Williams brought Dainty to you, so that Dainty could get you to intercede for him with the railroad company with reference to these two matters?—A. Oh, no; there was nothing suggested like that.

Q. That is what you talked about, was it not?—A. No; that is not what we principally talked about.

Q. Well, you did talk about it?—A. No.

Q. Not at all?—A. Not further than what I have suggested.

Q. Well, you did talk about it, then, to that extent?—A. Yes.

Q. As the result of that you went to Warriner to see what you could do for Dainty in that regard?—A. I went to Mr. Warriner and made a suggestion to Mr. Warriner that Mr. Dainty thought he could get the Llewellyn interest.

Q. And you asked him if he would rent Dainty this 320 acres of land?—A. I suggested, as I have said, that Mr. Dainty would like, if he succeeded in doing that, to get a lease on the Morris & Essex tract.

Q. Why did you do that, Judge?—A. As a matter of friendliness.

Q. To Dainty?—A. Yes.

Q. You had never met him before?—A. Oh, yes; I had.

Q. Was there any express understanding between you and Dainty that you were to share in the commission for the sale of the Everhart interest and in the profits of the lease which Dainty was to get for the 320 acres?—A. Absolutely not.

Q. Now, Judge, you did not know about the contribution by members of the bar until you got on board the ship, did you?—A. I did not.

Q. And you received it in a package with the letter about which you testified yesterday?—A. Yes.

Q. After you arrived in Europe you sat down and wrote to the contributors thanking them for it?—A. Yes.

Q. How did you know who the contributors were?—A. I did not know, except as their names appear.

Q. In this letter?—A. Well, there were others whose names are not in that letter.

Q. In this letter, marked "Exhibit UU"?—A. There were three others whose names are not in that letter.

Q. Where did you get those names?—A. After I got to Italy I received a letter from Mr. Searle, in which he communicated the fact that there had been additional contributions made by three members of the bar of Luzerne County, at Wilkes-Barre—Judge Wheaton, Mr. Woodward, and Mr. Lenahan—and he wanted to know whether he should forward that money to me. I told him no; that he should keep that until I got home.

Q. How much was there of that?—A. $125.

Q. Was that in addition to the $525 contained in the package?—A. It was.

Q. And where is that letter which you got from Searle?—A. I really do not know.

Q. I see you have indorsed this letter on the back for filing away to keep it, so that you could remember the names of the contributors, I presume?—A. I filed it away; yes. I preserved it.

Q. Why did you not preserve the other one in the same way, so that you could remember the other gentlemen?—A. I think I have.

Q. Why did you not bring it with you?—A. I did not think about it.

Q. Did you not think about that when you thought about this?—A. I beg pardon.

Q. Did you not think about that when you thought about this?—A. No; I did not. This was the particular characterization of the gift.

Q. When you got back, Mr. Searle gave you the $125, did he?—A. Yes.

Q. Making a total of $650?—A. Yes.

Q. How many times did you go to Warriner with reference to the Dainty transactions?—A. Once.

Q. Do you think Mr. Warriner was mistaken when he said you saw him more than once?—A. I do not remember what his testimony is. I would not be positive that I was limited to one time.

Q. Do you think Warriner was mistaken when he said you approached him with reference to that matter?—A. Well, I do not want to put my testimony in comparison with his or that of anyone else. I have only given you my remembrance.

Q. Do you remember he said that a year before that the road had contemplated purchasing that interest, but that they had not considered it lately?—A. I can not tell you about his testimony. I have given you mine.

Q. On yesterday you were asked about addressing these letters to the railroad companies on the Commerce Court paper. I believe you said then you had not any other paper?—A. I think that the paper that I had been using as district judge ran very low about that time. I believe some of the letters that I wrote were on district judge paper.

Q. Did you not have any blank paper?—A. I think there was some blank paper that was used in case of a letter going over one page.

Q. Did it occur to you that it would look better and be in better taste to write these railroad companies in reference to these business transactions on other paper?—A. It might have been better taste.

Q. Do you think you would have done it if you had had other paper there?—A. I could not tell you that.

Q. You did have other paper there, I presume, because in these letters where you have used more than one sheet the second sheet is always blank paper?—A. I think that is true.

Q. And that is the form in which the Commerce Court paper comes to the members, is it not?—A. No, not unless you ask especially for it; but I have special blank paper.

Q. You have it?—A. Yes. The form that that assumes, of course, is largely the result of the typewriting of my stenographer. I dictated a letter, and it was taken off and put on paper and I signed it.

Q. Let me ask you this. Have you noticed, Judge, in your correspondence which is in evidence in this case that in every instance where you addressed railroad companies or the officials of railroad companies concerning their coal properties and with reference to the negotiations which you were having with them, you used paper with letterheads "Commerce Court" on it, and that in all cases where you used blank paper it was correspondence not with railroad companies? Have you noticed that?—A. I have not.

Q. Did it occur to you at any time, Judge, that it would help to impress the railroad companies with the idea that you had jurisdiction over them in the Commerce Court?—A. It did not, Mr. STERLING.

Mr. Manager STERLING. That is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there any further questions?

Mr. SIMPSON. Yes, sir.

Redirect examination:

Q. (By Mr. SIMPSON.) In the course of your testimony in relation to Article I you said that as you recollected it, the price agreed upon with the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. for the Katydid dump was agreed upon in September. Do you recall a letter of August 30, 1911, page 139, referring to that matter?—A. That was the time. There was but one time. That was when Mr. Williams went to see Capt. May as a result of my meeting Capt. May in the street.

Q. You were asked also whether you saw anybody else than officials of the railroad company in relation to the purchase of the Katydid culm-dump matter. Do you recall the interviews had with Mr. Robertson and the papers that were drawn in relation to that?—A. Oh, yes; of course that occurred.

Q. That was in relation to this identical matter?—A. Yes; certainly; that was in relation to Mr. Robertson's interest, which was a very important part.

Q. The question was asked you by Mr. STERLING as to whether or not Capt. May knew that you had an interest in the Katydid transaction. Will you tell us, please, whether you ever told him that you had a financial interest in it?—A. I do not remember speaking about that. Oh, yes; I think I did. I think I wrote a letter when I asked him to keep the price confidential.

Q. That is one of the later letters that is in evidence in this case.—A. Yes; it is in evidence. At that time I was trying to secure the Brooke's property, the Birdsboro people's interest.

Q. I notice that in the agreement, or draft of an agreement, which was drawn by you between yourself and Mr. Williams and the Laurel line, there appears a clause that "the parties of the first part"—that is yourself and Mr. Williams—"do hereby grant, bargain, sell, and convey unto the parties of the second part, their successors, assigns, and so forth, all of the culm dump," and so forth. You were asked by Mr. STERLING whether or not there was any warranty in the agreement. Do you remember the Pennsylvania act of assembly which deals with those words, "grant, bargain, and sell"?—A. They are held to create a warranty.

Q. It is the act of 1705, is it not?—A. It is.

Q. You were also asked by Mr. STERLING whether or not your name appeared as a party interested, except in one letter, which was written by you to Mr. Conn. I find there are two letters in the record, one dated September 20, 1911, being Exhibit No. 10, page 184, and one dated November 6, 1911, being Exhibit No. 3, page 143. Your name appears as a party interested in both of those letters, does it not?—A. I can not speak except as the exhibit itself speaks.

Q. You would not undertake to say that if the exhibit shows that fact that it appeared only in one letter?—A. No; I do not pretend to contradict the exhibits.

Q. Do you remember what time of day you wrote the letter of October 3, 1911, to Mr. Loomis from Washington?—A. No; I do not.

Q. Do you remember what time of day it was mailed?—A. No; I do not.

Q. Can you tell us how long it takes a letter to go from Washington to Scranton?—A. If mailed in the afternoon of one day it will appear, I think, in Scranton about 11 o'clock. If it is put in the mail later than that in the day, it will not reach Scranton until about 4 in the afternoon of the following day.

Q. If a letter is put in the box in the morning of one day, what time would it reach Scranton?—A. It is not likely to reach Scranton until the following day.

Q. Then your letter of October 3, 1911, mailed from Washington, could not have reached Scranton until the 4th of October at the earliest?—A. No.

Q. And would hardly be the means of fixing a date of meeting on the 5th. My colleague calls my attention to the fact that this letter was sent to Mr. Loomis in New York. What time would it reach New York?—A. I do not know anything about the mails between here and New York, but I imagine they are very much more speedy than they are between here and Scranton.

Q. Would a letter mailed here at an ordinary hour, say after 10 o'clock, on one day, reach New York and be delivered before the next day?—A. I do not think it would. It is five full hours by the fastest train from here to New York.

Q. It was hardly likely, then, that that letter mailed to New York on the 3d of October would have reached New York in time to fix an interview in Scranton with parties that were to leave New York and be in Scranton on the 5th?—A. Well, I would want to consider that, Mr. Simpson, before I answered, sir.

Q. Will you tell us, please, whether or not you ever gave instructions to your stenographer and typewriter as to what paper she should use in writing letters for you?—A. No; I did not particularly.

Q. You say "particularly." I do not know quite what that means.—A. I never gave her any directions at all about it. I dictated a letter and when it came to me I signed it. I did not notice what paper it was on.

Q. Did you ever give her any instructions as to letters to be written to railroads or corporations any differently from letters to be written to anybody else?—A. No.

Mr. SIMPSON. I believe that is all, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there any further questions to be asked the witness?

Mr. Manager STERLING. There is nothing further of this witness, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMPSON. I offer in evidence, Mr. President, a transcript of the docket entries of the Commerce Court in the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. case.

[U. S. S. Exhibit H.]

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

(No. 722.—October term, 1911.)

The United States, The Interstate Commerce Commission, and The Federal Sugar Refining Co., appellants, v. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., The Central Railroad Co. of New Jersey, et al. Appeal from the United States Commerce Court.

(June 10, 1912.)

The Chief Justice delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a suit instituted in the Commerce Court to enjoin the enforcement of an order by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The complainants in the bill are the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., the Central Railroad Co. of New Jersey, the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co., the Erie Railroad Co., the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., the New York, Ontario & Western Railway Co., and the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. The Brooklyn Eastern District Terminal and John Arbuckle and William A. Jamison, copartners, trading as the Jay Street Terminal, intervened and were made parties complainant, they being interested to defeat the order of the commission.

The defendant named in the bill is the United States. The Interstate Commerce Commission appeared, and the Federal Sugar Refining Co. intervened and was made a party defendant.

The order which it was the purpose of the suit to enjoin was made in a proceeding commenced before the commission on behalf of the Federal Sugar Refining Co. to compel the railroads above named to desist and abstain from paying to Arbuckle Bros., claimed to be operating what is known as the Jay Street Terminal, certain so-called allowances for floatage, lighterage, and terminal services rendered by them to the complainants in connection with sugar transported by them in New York Harbor to and for the complainants, while at the same time paying no such allowances to the said Federal Refining Co. on its sugar.

We substantially adopt as accurate a summary statement made of the subject matter of the con' oversy in the brief of counsel for the railroad companies:

"The Federal Sugar Refining Co. has a refinery at Yonkers, N. Y., and Arbuckle Bros. have a refinery in the Borough of Brooklyn, New York City. The railroad companies operate what are known as trunk-line railroads, extending from New York to western and southern points. In order to receive and deliver freight in New York City they are obliged to transport the same across the waters of New York Harbor on lighters by what is called lighterage service, or, when the freight is carried through in railroad cars, on car floats by what is called floatage service.

"At numerous points along the New York City water front within the lighterage limits they have established public stations for the receipt and delivery of freight.

"They have also established boundaries known as 'lighterage limits,' including substantially all of what may be called the manufacturing and commercial portion of the water front of New York City and the opposite shore of New Jersey and within these boundaries they receive and deliver freight at any accessible point on the water front without any additional charge above the New York rates, which are, generally speaking, the same as the rates to and from the terminals on the New Jersey shore. At 'public' docks open to any vessel, the railroad pays the wharfage; at private docks the shipper or consignee must arrange for the necessary dockage.

"At a number of points in the boroughs of Brooklyn and the Bronx the railroad companies or some of them furnish public stations through arrangements made with terminal companies to furnish union public stations and terminal facilities for the receipt and delivery of freight in cars and through freight houses, and for the transportation of such freight between such terminal stations and the railroad companies' rails on the western shore of the harbor, all of which is done for and in the name of the railroad companies under provisions of their tariffs filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission under which their New York rates apply to and from such union public stations.

"One of these public terminal stations, known as the Jay Street Terminal, is owned and operated by William A. Jamison and John Arbuckle, conducting a separate business in that respect as copartners under the name and style of 'Jay Street Terminal' in accordance with the laws of the State of New York. Jay Street Terminal is named as a station of the railroad companies, appellees, in their respective tariffs, and is conducted under contract with the railroad companies like any other freight station, bills of lading being issued from and to it on behalf of the railroad companies and in their names, on the regular uniform form, charges being collected and accounts kept, the Jay Street Terminal performing the entire physical and clerical service and furnishing the necessary docks, freight yard, and station buildings and equipment, excepting cars. The Jay Street Terminal also floats or lighters all shipments between the terminal and the rails of the railroad companies on the New Jersey shore. For these services and facilities each railroad company pays to the Jay Street Terminal an aggregate compensation figured on the freight handled for it, based on the rate of 4½ cents per hundred pounds on freight originating at or destined to points at or west of the westerly limits of trunk line territory, so called, and 3 cents per hundred pounds on freight originating at or destined to points east of the westerly limit of trunk line territory. The same amounts per hundred pounds are paid to other terminal companies furnishing similar service at New York.

"The refinery of Arbuckle Brothers, a copartnership composed of William A. Jamison and John Arbuckle, is within two blocks of the Jay Street Terminal, and they truck sugar from their refinery to this terminal and load it into cars at their own expense and deliver it to the Jay Street Terminal and obtain the railroad company's bill of lading for it from the Jay Street Terminal just as other shippers do with other freight.

"The refinery of the Federal Sugar Refining Co., at Yonkers, N. Y., formerly operated by the Federal Sugar Refining Co. of Yonkers, is located on the Hudson River, 10 miles north of the limits of the lighterage limits. The sugar manufactured at this refinery and shipped over the lines of these appellees is loaded onto lighters of the Ben Franklin Transportation Co., an independent boat line with which the Federal Sugar Refining Co. has made a contract, under which the boat line lighters its sugar to the terminals of the railroad companies for 3 cents per hundred pounds. The boat line brings the sugar to the terminals of the railroads on the western shore of New York Harbor and delivers it to them for rail transportation.

"The Federal Sugar Refining Co.'s refinery at Yonkers is located directly on the tracks of the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. Over this railroad the rates to the points in the shipping territory of the Federal Sugar Refining Co. are with few exceptions the same as the rates via the lines of the railroad companies. To ship at the New York rate over the lines of the roads the Federal Sugar Refining Co. can deliver its shipments to the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad at Yonkers, thence to be transported by that railroad to New York and there delivered to the said railroad companies within lighterage limits. None of these railroads have lines extending to Yonkers. Because of alleged delay in the handling and transportation of shipments via this route, the Federal Sugar Refining Co. sometimes prefers to deliver said shipments by lighter to the said railroad companies at their stations on the New Jersey shore of New York Harbor.

"Prior to July, 1909, these shipments were carried by the Ben Franklin Transportation Co. directly to the rail terminals on the Jersey shore from Yonkers without stop. Since that date the lighters stop en route at Pier 24, North River. The reason for stopping at Pier 24 is found in the decision made by the commission in case No. 1082, brought by the Federal Sugar Refining Co., of Yonkers, the predecessor of the Federal Sugar Refining Co., against the same railroad companies, appellees here. (17 I. C. C., 40.) The complaint in that proceeding claimed a discrimination against the Federal Sugar Refining Co., of Yonkers, and in favor of the Jay Street Terminal and the Brooklyn Eastern District Terminal, an incorporated company operating a similar terminal station in another section of Brooklyn, because of the refusal of the railroad companies to pay it the same amounts on account of the lighterage performed by the Ben Franklin Transportation Co. from Yonkers to the rail terminals of the railroad company on the western shore of New York Harbor as were paid to the two terminal companies above named on account of the various services performed and terminal facilities furnished by them in connection with the transportation of sugar shipped by Arbuckle Bros. and the American Sugar Refining Co., respectively. This complaint was dismissed because the extension of the lighterage limits in New York Harbor of the railroad companies was a matter of business discretion, and that the commission had no authority to require such extension beyond the then prescribed boundaries, and that the Federal Sugar Refining Co., being located outside of the prescribed lighterage limits, was not subjected to unlawful discrimination by reason of the practice of the railroad companies in affording free lighterage on shipments originating at a distance to points within said lighterage limits while refusing to so afford on shipments of the Federal Sugar Refining Co.

"As a result of this decision of the commission the lighters of the Ben Franklin Transportation Co. were stopped en route from Yonkers at Pier 24, North River, where certain formalities with reference to shipping orders were had for the purpose of making it appear as a matter of law that these shipments were made not from Yonkers, but from Pier 24, North River, a point within lighterage limits. A new complaint was filed with the commission, setting forth the same grounds of discrimination as the prior one, but on the theory that the decision of the commission did not apply because the shipments of the Federal Sugar Refining Co. were now lightered from Pier 24, a point within lighterage limits, and not from Yonkers, the commission held as a matter of law that the stoppage of the lighters of the Ben Franklin Transportation Co. for instructions at Pier 24 differentiated the case from the former one and made the following order:

"'It is ordered that the above-named defendants (the appellees) be, and they are hereby, notified and required to cease and desist on or before the 15th day of April, 1911, and for a period of not less than two years thereafter abstain from paying such allowances to Arbuckle Bros. on their sugar, while at the same time paying no such allowance to said complainant (Federal Sugar Refining Co.) on its sugar, which said allowances so paid to said Arbuckle Bros. by said defendants are found by the commission in said report to be unduly discriminatory and in violation of the act to regulate commerce.'

"The so-called 'allowances' referred to in this order are a part of the payments making up the compensation of the Jay Street Terminal, figured at the rates of 3 cents and 4½ cents per hundred pounds as above described."

This is the order the enforcement of which was the subject matter of the controversy in the court below.

The United States, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Federal Sugar Refining Co. promptly filed motions to dismiss the petition and the intervening petition of the Jay Street Terminal upon the ground of want of equity and because the order of the commission was an adjudication of matters of fact as to which its judgment was conclusive. The petitioners, on the other hand, applied for an injunction pendente lite suspending the order of the commission until the final determination of the action. The motions to dismiss were denied. On the same day the motion for a temporary injunction—which had been heard upon the petition and intervening petitions and affidavits submitted by petitioners in support of the averments of the petition and intervening petition—was granted, and the assailed order "and its force and effect" was suspended until the further order of the court. This appeal was then taken.

There was clearly a right in the court below to entertain jurisdiction of the petition and to determine whether the affirmative order of the commission was entitled to be enforced. There was clearly also power in the court to allow a preliminary injunction, since that authority is conferred in express terms by section 3 (208) of the act. And the right to appeal from such an order is also in express terms conferred by section 2 (210) of the act.

It is urged on behalf of the United States and the Interstate Commerce Commission that, wholly irrespective of the merits of the petition, the order granting the interlocutory injunction must be reversed because of what is insisted to be the express requirements of the act imposing the duty on the Commerce Court or a judge of that court if a restraining order is granted under the conditions in the statute to state the facts from which it is found that irreparable injury would arise if a restraining order were not allowed. The section containing the provision relied upon is as follows:

"That suits to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be brought in the Commerce Court against the United States. The pendency of such suit shall not of itself stay or suspend the operation of the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission; but the Commerce Court, in its discretion, may restrain or suspend, in whole or in part, the operation of the commission's order pending the final hearing and determination of the suit. No order or injunction so restraining or suspending an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be made by the Commerce Court other than upon notice and after hearing, except that in cases where irreparable damage would otherwise ensue to the petitioner, said court, or a judge thereof, may, on hearing, after not less than three days' notice to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Attorney General, allow a temporary stay or suspension in whole or part of the operation of the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission for not more than 60 days from the date of the order of such court or judge, pending application to the court for its order or injunction, in which case the said order shall contain a specific finding, based upon evidence submitted to the judge making the order and identified by reference thereto, that such irreparable damage would result to the petitioner and specifying the nature of the damage. The court may, at the time of hearing such application, upon a like finding, continue the temporary stay or suspension in whole or in part until its decision upon the application."

Without ambiguity we think the statute contemplates three classes of orders: First, a temporary restraining order staying in whole or in part the operation of the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission for not more than 60 days from the date of the suspensive order, to be allowed by the court or a judge thereof; second, a preliminary injunction—that is, an injunction pendente lite—which, to quote the words of the statute, may be granted by the court to "restrain or suspend, in whole or in part, the operation of the commission's order pending the final hearing and determination of the suit"; third, in the nature of things a perpetual injunction upon the entry of the final decree. The order in this case, made after notice and hearing, suspending the force and effect of the order of the commission until the further order of the court, was obviously an exercise of the power conferred to grant a preliminary injunction or injunction pendente lite and not of the power to allow a temporary restraining order embraced in the first of the classes stated. As we think it clear that the requirements of the statute relied upon respecting the statement of facts as to irreparable damages relate only to the first class of cases—that is, the power to issue a temporary restraining order—we hold the objection to be without merit.

This brings us to consider the scope of our reviewing authority under the right conferred by the statute to appeal from the allowance by the court below of a preliminary injunction or injunction pendente lite. To determine this question requires a consideration of the nature and character of the powers which the court had a right to exert over the subject matter presented to it by the petition filed to perpetually enjoin the enforcement of the order of the commission.

We have determined in the Procter & Gamble case, ante, that the Commerce Court was but endowed in considering whether an affirmative order of the commission should be enforced on the one hand or set aside and declared nonenforcible on the other with the jurisdiction and power existing at the time that act was passed in the circuit courts of the United States. And as, at that time it was conclusively settled that the courts had only authority to reexamine the findings of the commission as to subjects like the one here under consideration, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the action of the commission was repugnant to the Constitution, in excess of the statutory powers conferred upon it, or manifested such an abuse as to be equivalent to an excess of authority, it clearly results that the court below was likewise limited in passing upon the petition before it in this case. This being true, it is also necessarily true that virtually the sole authority of the court below was in a sense confined to determining questions of law arising upon the case as presented on the face of the pleadings. Under the general principles of equity, where a court is called upon to decide whether it will allow a preliminary or pendente lite injunction the duty arising requires it to be determined whether on the face of the papers presented there is such an equitable cause of action presented as justifies the issue of a preliminary injunction to preserve the status pending the suit; that is, to afford an opportunity for a trial of the issues presented. Necessarily it is true also that where an appeal is allowed from an order granting a preliminary injunction the reviewing court is put to the duty of determining whether on the face of the papers the court below erred as a matter of law in granting the preliminary injunction. Do these principles apply to the case before us, is then the first consideration. The result of holding that they do will inevitably cause the expunging from the act of the express authority conferred to issue a preliminary injunction, since, viewed under the general principles of equity, the criteria by which to determine the rightfulness of such an order, in view of the nature and character of the jurisdiction of the Commerce Court, is exactly and exclusively the same criteria by which the rightfulness of a final decree of that court issuing a perpetual injunction in conformity to such decree would require to be tested. Our duty, however, is not to destroy the law but to enforce it, and in doing so to seek to discover the intention of the lawmaker, the wrong intended to be prevented, and the remedy designed to be afforded by the enactment of the statute. Coming to consider the statute for this purpose, we have pointed out in the Procter & Gamble case that the great remedy intended to be accomplished was the concentration in a single court of the power to consider the rightfulness of enforcing or setting aside orders of the commission; that to prevent unnecessary delays the limitations as to restraining orders and their duration and the hearing which is commanded as to irreparable injury was enacted. It must therefore in reason be that the power to issue a preliminary injunction was recognized and preserved so as to afford the court the proper time for deliberation and consideration of the questions to be decided by the commission, instead of compelling that body, virtually eo instante, upon the presentation of a petition to reach a final conclusion. And it would seem also to be the case that the right to appeal from such an order was given as a safeguard against a possible abuse of discretion by an unwarranted, arbitrary, and unreasonable exercise of the power conferred. In other words, we think that the enlightened purpose of Congress was that the court which it created, in the exercise of the important trusts confided to its authority and where occasion required it as a consequence of the gravity and complexity of the legal questions which might arise, should be afforded ample opportunity for due consideration and ripe judgment and that it was not intended to compel precipitate and perhaps ill-considered action.

Coming to consider the case presented in the light of these principles, in view of the doubt which existed as to the scope and effect of the powers conferred upon the commission, as shown by the decision of the court in the Procter & Gamble case, of the nature and character of the subject matter here under consideration and its importance, of the action of the commission had on that subject prior to the making of the order of the commission which was assailed by the petition, and especially of the diversity of opinion which existed among the members of the commission on the subject, we think there is no room for saying that the preliminary injunction issued was in excess of the power conferred upon the court, because of the plain want of necessity for it resulting from the obvious nature and character of the legal questions as to which the judgment of the court was invoked in consequence of the filing of the petition calling for the exertion of the authority conferred upon it by Congress.

It is not disputable that although the right to appeal to this court from an order like the one here in question is conferred, yet obviously the purpose which must have caused the creation of the Commerce Court must have been the desire to interpose between the action of the commission and this court an intermediate tribunal, having the powers which the statute delegates to it. Our duty is to give that purpose effect and to uphold the lawful authority of the court, without deviation and yet without hesitancy where there has been an abuse of discretion to correct it in the completest way. But as this case manifests no such abuse, our duty is not to reverse the action of the court but to remand the case so that there may be an opportunity to dispose of it on the merits in the forum selected by Congress for that purpose. Of course, in saying this, we must not be understood as deciding or in any way implying that the duty would not exist to examine the merits of a preliminary order of the general character of the one before us in a case where it plainly in our judgment appeared that the granting of the preliminary order was in effect a decision by the court of the whole controversy on the merits or where it was demonstrable that grave detriment to the public interest would result from not considering and finally disposing of the controversy without remanding to enable the court below to do so.

Affirmed.

Mr. P. J. Farrell for the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. Ernest A. Bigelow for the Federal Sugar Refining Co.

Before Knapp, presiding judge, and Hunt, Carland, and Mack, judges.

(November 15, 1912.)

Carland, judge:

The petition in this case was filed April 12, 1911, and seeks to have annulled and set aside an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, dated March 6, 1911, the provisions of which are hereinafter stated. On April 19, 1911, upon its own petition, the Federal Sugar Refining Co. was made a party defendant, with leave to appear and be represented by counsel. On May 11, 1911, the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Sugar Refining Co. filed a motion to dismiss the petition for the reason that the facts set forth therein did not constitute a cause of action, and on the same day the Brooklyn Eastern District Terminal Co., upon leave granted, filed its intervening petition. On May 12, 1911, the United States filed a motion to dismiss for the reason, among others therein stated, that the petition did not show there was any equity therein upon which to grant the relief prayed or any part of the same. On the same day the Jay Street Terminal and Arbuckle Bros., upon leave granted, filed their intervening petition. On May 17, 1911, upon motion of Mr. Blackburn Esterline, assistant to the Attorney General, it was ordered that the motion to dismiss the petition filed by the United States be extended and considered as a motion to dismiss the intervening petition of Arbuckle Bros. and Brooklyn Eastern District Terminal, and upon motion of Mr. P. J. Farrell, counsel for the Interstate Commerce Commission, it was ordered that the motion to dismiss the petition filed by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Sugar Refining Co. be extended to and considered as a motion to dismiss the intervening petition of Arbuckle Bros. and the Brooklyn Eastern District Terminal.

On May 17, 1911, the motions for a temporary injunction made by the petitioners and intervening petitioners, and the motions to dismiss, came on for hearing before the court; and thereafter, on May 22, 1911, the motions to dismiss were by the unanimous decision of this court denied, with leave to the respondents making said motions to answer the petition of the petitioners within 20 days from said date if they should be so advised; and on the same day the motions made for a temporary injunction were granted and an order entered suspending the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission complained of until the further order of the court.

On June 12, 1911, the Federal Sugar Refining Co. and the Interstate Commerce Commission prayed an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from the order or decree of the Commerce Court rendered on May 22, 1911, and assigned as one of the errors committed by this court that it erred in not dismissing the petition for want of equity. The appeal prayed for was allowed by this court on June 13, 1911. On June 16, 1911, the United States prayed an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from the order or decree of this court entered May 22, 1911, and assigned as error, among others, that the Commerce Court erred in not sustaining the motion of the United States to dismiss the petition and the intervening petitions. The appeal prayed for was granted by this court on the same day. On June 10, 1912, the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the decree of this court entered May 22, 1911.

On June 9, 1911, the Federal Sugar Refining Co. filed its answer to the original petition, and on the same day the United States filed its answer to the original petition and also to the intervening petitions of Arbuckle Bros. and Brooklyn Eastern District Terminal. The Interstate Commerce Commission has never answered either of the petitions.

The mandate of the Supreme Court was filed in this court on June 24, 1912. On October 10, 1912, the United States and the Federal Sugar Refining Co., upon leave granted by the court, withdrew their several answers, and on the same day filed their motion to dismiss the petition of the petitioners for the reason that the facts set forth in said petition did not constitute a cause of action or entitle said petitioners to the relief or any of the relief asked for by them in and by said petition. This action of the United States and the Federal Sugar Refining Co. left the case standing upon the petitions of the petitioners and the intervening petitioners and the motions to dismiss of the respondent, and intervening respondents Federal Sugar Refining Co. and Interstate Commerce Commission. In this condition of the case the parties, by their counsel, appeared in open court and stipulated that the case be submitted to the court for final decision upon the merits on the petitions and motions to dismiss.

The material facts as they appear in the petitions are as follows:

The petitioning railroads are engaged in the transportation of passengers and property by railroad from one State to another, and all have rail termini upon the New Jersey shore of the harbor of New York except the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., whose rail terminus is at St. George, Staten Island, and the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., whose rail terminus for passenger traffic only is in the Borough of Manhattan. In order to reach the shipping territory of Greater New York across the Hudson and East Rivers and other waters petitioners have been compelled to serve the vast shipping interests of Greater New York by means of floats, lighters, and barges. Petitioners have established a lighterage zone, known as the lighterage limits, which has been in effect for several years, and during that time has been and is now described in the tariffs of each of said petitioners, which tariffs have been and are duly filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, as follows:

"North River: New York side, Battery to One hundred and thirty-fifth Street; New Jersey side, Jersey City, N. J., to and including Fort Lee, N. J.

"East River and Harlem River: New York side, Battery to Jerome Avenue Bridge, including Harlem River side of Wards and Randalls Islands; Brooklyn side, from Pot Cove, Astoria, to and including Newtown and Dutch Kills Creeks and points in Wallabout Canal west of Washington Avenue Bridge and to Hamilton Avenue Bridge, Gowanus Canal, to and including Sixty-ninth Street, South Brooklyn (Bay Ridge).

"New York Bay: Points on north and east shore of Staten Island between Bridge Creek (Arlington) and Clifton, both inclusive, and include Shooter Island; points on the New Jersey shore of New York Bay and on the Kill von Kull between Constable Hook and Avenue C, Bayonne City, opposite Port Richmond, Staten Island."

Within said lighterage limits petitioners perform, without additional charge, a lighterage service on eastbound shipments from their rail terminals upon the western shore of New York Harbor to points within those limits, and on westbound shipments from points within those limits to their rail terminals upon the western shore of New York Harbor.

Within said lighterage limits and at various points within the Boroughs of Manhattan and Brooklyn, city of New York, each petitioner has established and for several years has maintained, and still maintains, freight terminal stations at which it delivers east-bound freight and receives west-bound freight for transportation over its lines. Each petitioner has some freight terminal stations, as aforesaid, which it owns and directly operates, and others which are operated for it under and pursuant to the provisions of certain contracts between it and the owners of said terminal stations. In some instances a single terminal station is operated for and on behalf of two or more of said petitioners under and pursuant to certain contracts between them and the owner of said station, and in such instances said terminal station is a union terminal for two or more of said petitioners. It is impossible for petitioners to deliver and receive all freight, especially carload freight, at said terminals. A large part of it must of necessity be delivered and received at public and private docks within the said lighterage limits. Accordingly, petitioners have for several years received and delivered freight at all steamship piers, docks, and landings, and private piers or landings when shippers or consignees arrange for the receipt or delivery of freight within the lighterage limits, and have lightered it without additional charge from and to said points, and still do so receive, deliver, and lighter it. Petitioners transport between said terminal stations, piers, docks, and landings and their rail terminals on the western shore of New York Harbor, as a part of the transportation service from the points of shipment to the point of destination, and for the flat New York rate, by means of lighters, floats, and barges owned and directly operated by them, or operated for them under contracts between them and the owners of such equipment, freight received at or destined to said terminal stations, piers, docks, and landings.

Petitioners for several years past have held and now hold themselves out as common carriers to and from all said points within the lighterage limits, both by their practice of receiving and delivering freight at said points and by their tariffs, which are now and for several years past have been duly published and filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission. The liability under their respective bills of lading attaches to petitioners on west-bound shipments from the time the freight is received at such terminal station, dock, pier, or landing and ends on east-bound shipments when delivered into the hands of the consignee at such terminal station, dock, pier, or landing. The bill of lading issued by petitioners for freight so received or delivered by them by its terms covers and includes the lighterage movement.

Among other terminal freight stations established by petitioners within the said lighterage limits is the Jay Street Terminal. This terminal is located at the foot of Bridge Street, Brooklyn, on the East River, having a water frontage of 1,200 feet and a depth of 600 feet. Its equipment consists of a large freight house, 2 Baldwin locomotives, 3 tugboats, 2 steam lighters, 11 barges, and 9 car floats. The capacity of the yard is about 235 cars. The Jay Street Terminal is a union freight terminal for all of said petitioners and is designated as a regular public freight terminal of petitioners in their tariffs filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is owned by a copartnership composed of William A. Jamison and John Arbuckle, conducting such freight terminal as a separate business under the name and style of Jay Street Terminal, under certificate filed with the clerk of New York County, in accordance with the law of the State of New York, and is operated as a freight station for petitioners under and pursuant to several contracts between petitioners and the Jay Street Terminal, which contracts are substantially identical in their terms and provisions. The material parts of one of said contracts and representative of them all appears in the margin, and is as follows:

This agreement, made the 5th day of February, A. D. 1906, by and between Jay Street Terminal (hereinafter called Terminal Co.), party of the first part, and Erie Railroad Co., party of the second part, witnesseth:

"Whereas the Terminal Co. is the owner of premises in the Borough of Brooklyn, city of New York, lying along and contiguous to the East River at a point east of Catherine Ferry, so called, and west of the United States navy yard, upon which there are now erected, or in process of erection, certain warehouses, bulkheads, docks and piers, railway tracks and sidings, equipped or about to be equipped with suitable float bridges and approaches, and the usual appurtenances for receiving, handling, and delivering freights and for transporting same between said premises and the freight station of said railroad company located at Jersey City, N. J.; and

"Whereas the said Terminal Co. is engaged in and will continue in the business of receiving freights at its said premises and carrying the same in both directions between its said premises and the said station of said railroad company and other carriers; and

"Whereas the said railroad company desires to avail itself of the facilities, conveniences, and services of the said Terminal Co. in the transportation of freights, in both directions, between the said premises of said Terminal Co. and the aforesaid freight station of the said railroad company:

"Now, therefore, in consideration of the mutual covenants, promises, and agreements herein contained, the said parties do hereby covenant, promise, and agree to and with each other as follows:

"First. The said Terminal Co. will put and maintain its premises in good order and condition for the reception and delivery of such freights, and will provide tugboats, car floats, docks, piers, float bridges, and approaches adequate at all times to receive, discharge, transfer, and deliver such freights loaded or to be loaded in cars under this contract, and sufficient to accommodate the amount of business hereunder contemplated.

"Second. Said Terminal Co. will receive at the said float bridges of said railroad company at its aforesaid freight station, in cars to be placed upon its floats by said railroad company, all freights intended for delivery at the aforesaid premises of the said Terminal Co., and will safely carry the same to its said premises, and there make delivery thereof to the consignees. It will also receive and load into cars all freights which may be delivered to it at its said premises for transportation over the lines of said railroad company and carry and deliver the same to said railroad company upon said Terminal Co.'s floats at the float bridges of said railroad company at its aforesaid freight station.

"Third. The responsibility of said Terminal Co. for eastwardly bound cars and the freights therein shall begin when the cars are placed upon its floats at the said float bridges at the aforesaid station of said railroad company, and shall continue as respects the cars until they have been returned by it, loaded or empty; and as respects the freights contained in eastwardly bound cars its responsibility shall continue until the actual delivery thereof to and acceptance by the consignees at Brooklyn. As respects the freights to be transported westbound, said Terminal Co.'s responsibility shall commence at the time the same is received from the consignor at its aforesaid premises and shall continue until said freights, loaded into cars, have been brought to the float bridge of said railroad company at its aforesaid freight station and until the floats have been attached to the float bridge and the cars are in complete readiness for removal from the car floats by said railroad company.

"Fifth. The railroad company agrees to construct and maintain all necessary tracks, float bridges, approaches, and appurtenances at its said freight station to adequately carry out the purpose of this agreement.

"Sixth. Said railroad company will pay said Terminal Co. in full for all its services under this contract, as well as in full compensation for all responsibility to be undertaken by it in respect to cars and freight, as follows:

"(a) For all freights transported over said railroad company's railroad which shall have been received from its connecting lines west of trunk line western termini on through rates, or for freight received by the said Terminal Co. at its aforesaid premises and destined for transportation by said railroad company to points west of said western termini on through rates, excepting grain in bulk, at the rate of 4½ cents per hundred pounds. It is agreed, however, that whenever the allowance to Palmers Dock on eastbound or westbound rail-and-lake traffic or both is reduced from 4½ cents to 3 cents per hundred pounds the same reduction shall be made in the allowance to Jay Street Terminal on rail-and-lake traffic. And it is also agreed that whenever the allowance for like service on such traffic to said Palmers Dock or any other Brooklyn termini is increased above the rates herein specified the same increase shall be made in the allowance to said Jay Street Terminal on such traffic.

"(b) For freight originating at or destined to any of the said western termini or points east thereof, or billed to or from said western termini at local rates, the allowance to said Terminal Co. shall be 3 cents per hundred pounds, whether or not the traffic reaches the terminal point through any other of said termini, it being understood that the western terminal points referred to are as follows: Suspension Bridge, Niagara Falls, Tonawanda, Black Rock, Buffalo, East Buffalo, Buffalo Junction, Salamanca, Erie, Pittsburgh, Allegheny, Bellaire, Wheeling, Parkersburg, Dunkirk.

"(c) For 'not to be graded' grain in bulk, for track delivery in the borough of Brooklyn, the rate shall be 3 cents per hundred pounds.

"(d) For freight which is rated per gross ton, either in official classification or in commodity tariffs, the allowance shall be 3 cents or 4½ cents per hundred pounds, regardless of the gross-ton rating.

* * * * * * *

"Eleventh. Said railroad company agrees that during the continuance of this agreement the same rates of freight shall prevail from and to the premises of said Terminal Co. that prevail from and to the regular freight stations of said railroad company in the borough of Manhattan, city of New York, excepting when coming from or going to points east of Susquehanna, in which case floatage shall be added in both directions, to which the railroad company shall be entitled.

"Twelfth. Said Terminal Co. will be responsible for and pay to said railroad company all freight moneys and charges as set forth in freight bills rendered by said railroad company for the transportation of east-bound freights delivered to it, and in like manner shall be responsible for and pay to said railroad company all moneys and charges which have been made payable in advance on west-bound freights, all of which payments shall be turned over to said railroad company in accordance with the latter's customary rules; and, if so required, the customary guaranteed bond shall be furnished by the said Terminal Co.

"Thirteenth. Said railroad company will provide sufficient cars at all times for receiving and taking away the freights hereunder contemplated (unavoidable delay excepted), and to supply all the railway books and blanks necessary for the purpose of the business to be carried on under this contract, and with all reasonable dispatch to receive and take away from the said float bridges at its aforesaid station all the west-bound freights intended for transportation over its own lines and its connections.

"Fourteenth. Said Terminal Co. will insure and keep insured against loss by fire and marine risks all freights, cars, and property received by it upon its floats or its said premises under this contract so long as said freights, cars, or property shall remain in its possession, and until delivered to the consignees or to said railroad company as hereinbefore provided, including the time such freights, cars, or property shall be upon its lighterage line; and such insurance shall be for the benefit of said railroad company and others as their respective interests shall appear, and to an amount and in such manner as shall be satisfactory to said railroad company.

"Fifteenth. Said railroad company will not during the continuance of this agreement, unless legally compelled to do so, establish or maintain any freight stations within the limits of said Borough of Brooklyn between said Catherine Ferry and said United States navy yard. In case of any breach of this condition said Terminal Co. may recover from said railroad company, and the latter shall pay to said Terminal Co. damages at the rate of $3 for each and every carload, averaged at 20,000 pounds, received or delivered or transported contrary to this provision.

"Sixteenth. In case any east-bound freight consigned to stations of said railroad company in said city of New York other than the premises of said Terminal Co. shall have its destination changed to the premises of the said Terminal Co. and be delivered thereat, said Terminal Co. will, at the request of said railroad company, collect from the consignee or forwarder the sum of 3 cents per hundred pounds, and such 3 cents per hundred pounds shall be retained by said Terminal Co. as full compensation for all services performed by it in such cases, and no other allowance shall be made under this contract in such case.

"Seventeenth. Said Terminal Co. will furnish said railroad company with a complete and accurate copy of each and all contracts made by it with other railroad companies during the term of this contract, and the Erie Railroad Co. shall have and enjoy during the life of this contract all rights and privileges granted to any other railroad by said Terminal Co. upon as favorable terms, with respect to allowances or otherwise, as granted to any other railroad company, anything herein to the contrary notwithstanding.

"Eighteenth. This contract shall become operative and go into effect on the 15th day of February, 1906, and shall continue in force until March 31, 1910; thereafter subject to termination upon 90 days' notice by either party."

The Jay Street Terminal serves the shippers of a large and important manufacturing and shipping territory, including about one-third of the densely populated part of Brooklyn. It is the only convenient and accessible freight station of petitioners for the shippers of that territory. When it became necessary several years ago for petitioners to establish and operate public freight terminals for the service of said territory, they had no choice but to enter into a contractual arrangement with the owner of the Jay Street Terminal for the operation of said terminal as a public freight station of petitioners. The price of the water-front property in that section was so high as to be prohibitive. No independent terminals other than the Jay Street Terminal were conveniently accessible to the shippers of that territory. In no other practicable way could petitioners in the past, nor can they at present, serve the large and important shipping interests of this section of Brooklyn than by the maintenance of the Jay Street Terminal as a public freight station of petitioners under and pursuant to said contracts.

Arbuckle & Jamison operate a sugar refinery in the Borough of Brooklyn, located upward of a block from the Jay Street Terminal. Shipments are carted from and to the terminal by Arbuckle & Jamison and handled at the terminal in the same way as the freight of hundreds of other shippers, and the freight charges thereon are collected from said Arbuckle & Jamison by the Jay Street Terminal in accordance with the regularly published tariffs of petitioners. Approximately four-fifths of the shipments of sugar made by Arbuckle & Jamison through said Jay Street Terminal are sold by said Arbuckle & Jamison f. o. b. Brooklyn and become the property of the consignees immediately upon delivery to the terminal. During the first six months of 1907 the bills of lading issued by the Jay Street Terminal for shipments of general merchandise numbered 92,622, of which 3,969 were for Arbuckle & Jamison sugar and 1,210 for Arbuckle & Jamison coffee, and the shipments and receipts of said Arbuckle & Jamison constituted less than one-third of the total tonnage moving through the terminal. During the same period the number of different consignees who received freight at the terminal was about 765, and the number of different shippers through the terminal about 560. The profits in the operation of the Jay Street Terminal on all shipments during the same period amounted to less than 3 per cent on the investment, without making any allowances for depreciation or interest.

The Federal Sugar Refining Co. is a corporation of the State of New York, having its executive offices at 138 Front Street, in the Borough of Manhattan, and having its refineries from which it ships all its outbound products, including sugar, and at which it receives all its inbound supplies for the manufacture of sugar and commodities allied thereto, on the east bank of the Hudson River, within the corporate limits of the city of Yonkers, and more than 10 miles distant from the northernmost boundaries of the lighterage limits of petitioners. Said refineries are located on the line of the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co., with which they have switch connections and over which the Federal Sugar Refining Co. ships the greater part of its output and receives a large part of its inbound shipments. Over this railroad, with few exceptions, the rates to points in the shipping territory of the Federal Sugar Refining Co. are the same as the rates from the Jay Street Terminal over the lines of petitioners. In order to make shipments of its sugar from Yonkers via the lines of petitioners at the New York rate the Federal Sugar Refining Co. must deliver such shipments to the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. at Yonkers, thence to be transported by that railroad to New York, and there delivered to petitioners at points within the lighterage limits. Because of alleged delay in the handling and transportation of such shipments via the route aforesaid, the Federal Sugar Refining Co. prefers to deliver said shipments directly to petitioners by lighter within the lighterage limits. Prior to July, 1909, the Federal Sugar Refining Co. of Yonkers, the predecessor of the Federal Sugar Refining Co., was accustomed to deliver its shipments at Yonkers to the Ben Franklin Transportation Co., which transported the same direct to the terminals of petitioners on the west shore of New York Harbor at a charge to the Federal Sugar Refining Co. of Yonkers of 3 cents per hundred pounds.

In the month of May, 1907, the Federal Sugar Refining Co. of Yonkers filed a complaint with the Interstate Commerce Commission against petitioners, alleging that the complainant, through the Ben Franklin Transportation Co., performed the same service on its shipments of sugar as were said to be performed by the Brooklyn Eastern District Terminal on shipments of the American Sugar Refining Co. and by the Jay Street Terminal on shipments of Arbuckle & Jamison; that the lighterage limits prescribed by petitioners were unduly discriminatory in that they did not extend to Yonkers and include the refinery of the Federal Sugar Refining Co. of Yonkers, and permitted allowances to be made on shipments of sugar from the refineries of Arbuckle & Jamison and the American Sugar Refining Co., while not so permitting on the complainant's shipments, because the latter was located outside the prescribed limits. This practice was said to result in unjust discrimination and to oblige complainant to pay unreasonable rates. Said complaint was answered by petitioners, and after due hearing and consideration the Interstate Commerce Commission dismissed said complaint, because the extension of petitioners' lighterage limits in New York Harbor was a matter of business discretion, and said commission had no authority to require such extension beyond the then prescribed boundaries, and complainant, being located outside of the prescribed lighterage limits, was not subjected to unlawful discrimination by reason of the practice of petitioners in affording free lighterage on shipments originating at or destined to points within said lighterage limits, while refusing to so afford on complainants' shipments.

As a device to appear to ship from within the lighterage limits, within a month after the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission above mentioned a new corporation known as the Federal Sugar Refining Co. was organized, which established its principal office at 138 Front Street, New York City, and took over the refineries heretofore mentioned, in the city of Yonkers, and adopted the following practice: Contracts of sale or orders for sugar were received at 138 Front Street, and each of said orders was given a separate contract number, and said order bearing the contract number was forwarded to the refinery, where the order was filled and the barrels or bags were stamped with the contract number and placed on a lighter. The shipment bearing the contract number remained intact until it reached the hands of the buyer. The refinery received shipping instructions from 138 Front Street, and these shipping instructions showed the contract number, the ultimate destination, and the rail line over which the shipment was to be transported. The captain of the lighter of the Ben Franklin Transportation Co. gave a receipt to the refinery and received from the refinery a so-called bill of lading, which was a form of railroad bill of lading filled in by the Federal Sugar Refining Co., and designating a consignment to the Federal Sugar Refining Co., 138 Front Street, New York City, to be transported by the Ben Franklin Transportation Co. and showing the contract number with which the shipment had been marked. This alleged bill of lading was not signed by the Ben Franklin Transportation Co. through any of its officers or the captain of the lighter or by any other carrier. There was nothing in any of the documents which called for transportation to Pier 24, North River.

The said shipping instructions sent from 138 Front Street to Yonkers were to ship to "Federal Sugar Refining Co., 138 Front Street, City. B. F. T. Co. (B. & O.)," or other initials representing the Ben Franklin Transportation Co. and one of petitioners, as the case might be. None of the petitioners could or did perform any transportation service in connection with the Ben Franklin Transportation Co. between Yonkers and 138 Front Street, and such shipping instructions were, in fact, directions to deliver said shipments to the Ben Franklin Transportation Co. to be lightered and delivered to one of petitioners at its terminal on the west shore of New York Harbor. The practice was for the lighter of the Ben Franklin Transportation Co. to go to Pier 24, North River, N. Y., part of which pier is leased to the Ben Franklin Transportation Co., where the captain of the lighter called up the office of the Federal Sugar Refining Co., at 138 Front Street, and reported the particular shipment then on his lighter. The captain of the lighter was then handed a form of bill of lading not signed by any of petitioners and showing the name and address of the consignor as the Federal Sugar Refining Co., 138 Front Street, New York, Franklin Street Pier 24, North River. The lighter then proceeded to the rail terminus of such petitioners as had been previously designated in the shipping instructions sent to Yonkers, and there delivered the shipment to such petitioner and obtained the signature of petitioner's agent at said terminus upon the form of bill of lading theretofore prepared and delivered to said captain as aforesaid, and said bill of lading was stamped by said petitioner's agent to show the receipt of the shipment at said station on the west shore of New York Harbor.

Such shipments were handled under contract between the Ben Franklin Transportation Co. and the Federal Sugar Refining Co. for a compensation of 3 cents per 100 pounds, although the contract provides for a compensation of 4 cents per 100 pounds on sugar lightered from Yonkers to Pier 24, North River, payments for said service being made to the Ben Franklin Transportation Co. under that provision of said contract which provides for a compensation of 3 cents per 100 pounds for sugar lightered from Yonkers to petitioners' rail termini.

Having established the practice above described, the said Federal Sugar Refining Co. filed a complaint in October, 1909, with the Interstate Commerce Commission against petitioners. Said complaint alleged in substance that the interstate transportation of the product of the said Federal Sugar Refining Co. began at Pier 24, North River, Borough of Manhattan, a point within the lighterage limits as aforesaid, and that said Jay Street Terminal is owned and conducted by copartners named John Arbuckle and William A. Jamison, which said copartners owned, maintained, and operated in connection therewith a sugar refinery at the foot of Jay Street, Borough of Brooklyn; that said amounts of 3 cents per 100 pounds and 4½ cents per 100 pounds were paid to said copartners for the lightering of their sugar from Jay Street, Brooklyn, to the rail termini of petitioners on the west bank of New York Harbor, and that inasmuch as the said Federal Sugar Refining Co. was a competitor of the said Arbuckle & Jamison in the sugar business, it constituted an undue and unreasonable prejudice and disadvantage against said Federal Sugar Refining Co. to pay said amounts of 3 cents and 4½ cents per 100 pounds for the handling of sugar to said Arbuckle & Jamison, and not to pay similarly to the said Federal Sugar Refining Co. Hearings were had before the Interstate Commerce Commission upon the last mentioned complaint, and subsequently the commission issued its order against petitioners in the following language:

"It is ordered that the above-named defendants be, and they are hereby, notified and required to cease and desist, on or before the 15th day of April, 1911, and for a period of not less than two years thereafter abstain, from paying such allowances to Arbuckle Bros. on their sugar while at the same time paying no such allowances to said complainant on its sugar, which said allowances so paid to said Arbuckle Bros. by said defendants are found by the commission in said report to be unduly discriminatory and in violation of the act to regulate commerce."

The leave granted by this court allowing the United States and the Federal Sugar Refining Co. to withdraw their answers and file motion to dismiss undoubtedly entitles them to be again heard as to whether the petition states a cause of action, although the record thus presented is a novel one. We certainly are in no position, after having denied the motions to dismiss and after the Supreme Court has affirmed our action, so far as the granting of the temporary injunction is concerned, to now hold upon the same facts that the petitions do not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, merely because the case is now submitted for final decision. We are of the same opinion, however, as when we denied the motions to dismiss on May 22, 1911, but as we did not at that time give the reasons which impelled us to make the decision then rendered, we can now with propriety state them.

The Interstate Commerce Commission in its report and order did not specify whether it found a violation of section 2 or section 3 of the act to regulate commerce. These sections read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That if any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, by any special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device, charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for any service rendered or to be rendered, in the transportation of passengers or property, subject to the provisions of this act, than it charges, demands, collects, or receives from any other person or persons for doing for him or them a like and contemporaneous service in the transportation of a like kind of traffic under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, such common carrier shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

"SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever, or to subject any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever." * * *

The language used by the commission would lead to the inference that it found a violation of section 3. If the facts pleaded, however, show a violation of either of the above sections, the order must be sustained, and it must also be sustained if based upon a finding of fact, which we are not at liberty to review. In the first place, the case must be freed from matters which cloud the real issue. It is continually suggested that the arrangement between petitioners and the Jay Street Terminal may be a scheme to cover a rebate. We are not permitted to base our judgment on suspicion, but upon facts pleaded and proven. Respondents have been given ample opportunity to produce all evidence within their power for the purpose of showing that the payments made by petitioners to the Jay Street Terminal constitute unlawful rebates, but no such evidence has been produced. On the contrary, respondents withdrew their answers and now ask the court to decide the case upon the facts stated in the petition. Surely upon this record the court ought to be relieved of presuming that the contracts made by petitioners with the Jay Street Terminal are a cover for the payment of unlawful rebates.

Again, the performance of the Ben Franklin Transportation Co. at Pier 24, North River, is a play in which the episode is lost in the dénouement. It is a plain device and subterfuge indulged in on behalf of the Federal Sugar Refining Co. for the purpose of making it seem that sugar which is being lightered from Yonkers, N. Y., 10 miles north of the lighterage limits established by petitioners, was in fact shipped from Pier 24 by a delivery of the same at that point to the petitioners, when the uncontradicted record, as admitted by the motions to dismiss, shows that the petitioners have nothing to do with the sugar of the Federal Sugar Refining Co. until it reaches the New Jersey shore and is there delivered to petitioners. Courts of equity, looking through mere forms to the substance of things, can not, nor ought they be asked to, found their judgment upon a plain subterfuge. No sugar is tendered by the Federal Sugar Refining Co. to petitioners at Pier 24. On the contrary, the Ben Franklin Transportation Co., acting for the Federal Sugar Refining Co., refuses to tender it there and allow it to be taken by petitioners, but insists upon transporting it itself to the rail termini. The statement of facts makes it plain that the Federal Sugar Refining Co. transports its sugar direct from Yonkers to the Jersey shore, and we must find as a matter of law that the transportation of Federal sugar by petitioners does not commence until it is delivered to them at their rail termini. The facts do not bring the case within the ruling of the Supreme Court in Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fe Railway Co. v. Texas (204 U. S., 403).

We must indulge in the presumption that the commission found nothing unlawful in the payments made by petitioners to the Jay Street Terminal under the facts appearing in the record, or it would not have framed its order in the alternative. (Penn Refining Co. v. W. N. Y. & P. R. R. Co., 208 U. S., 208. East Tenn., etc., R. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 181 U. S., 1. Interstate Commerce Commission v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., 190 U. S., 273. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. United States, 197 Fed., 58–60.)

There can be no doubt as a matter of law under the facts admitted that transportation by petitioners of freight delivered to them at the Jay Street Terminal commences at said terminal and that the services performed by the Jay Street Terminal are transportation services. In our disposition of the case we make no distinction between the Jay Street Terminal and Arbuckle Bros., but treat them as the same entity in legal effect. It then appears that petitioners under their respective contracts are paying the Jay Street Terminal for a terminal service and also for the transportation of freight from the terminal to the Jersey shore. Providing this charge is reasonable, and there is no suggestion that it is not, we understand the law to permit such payment. (Central Stock Yards Co. v. L. & N. Railway Co., 192 U. S., 568. R. R. Com. of Ky. v. L. & N. Railway Co., 10 I. C. C. Rep., 173. Cattle Raisers Ass'n v. C., B. & Q. R. R. Co., 11 I. C. C. Rep., 277. Sec. 15, act to regulate commerce, as amended. Interstate Commerce Commission v. Diffenbaugh, 222 U. S., 42.)

This case is in no way parallel to the case of Union Pacific Railway Co. v. Updyke (222 U. S., 15). The Jay Street Terminal is one of the public terminals of petitioners, and it is owned by Arbuckle Bros. The payments made by petitioners to the Jay Street Terminal are for the terminal and transportation services performed by it in connection with all freight shipped from or delivered to said Jay Street Terminal. It so happens that Arbuckle Bros., who own and operate the terminal, also are shippers, and only in this way can it be said that they receive payment for transporting their own sugar. In order to make the case parallel to the Updyke case, it would have to appear that the Federal Sugar Refining Co. also owned and operated for petitioners a public terminal for the receipt and delivery of freight within the lighterage limits and that the Federal Sugar Refining Co. had sugar of its own which it transported to the rails of petitioners, together with other freight. If the case stood in such position, under the Updyke case it might be necessary to hold that the petitioners must make the same payments to the Federal Sugar Refining Co. as to Jay Street Terminal. But the always-present fact is that the Federal Sugar Refining Co. does not own and operate any public terminal for petitioners, nor does it transport a pound of sugar from any terminal within the lighterage limits to the rail termini of petitioners. There is no room for the court to enforce equality between Arbuckle Bros. and the Federal Sugar Refining Co. as to payments for the transportation of their sugar, for the reason that the position in which the court finds the respective parties to the controversy will not permit. We find Arbuckle Bros. owning the Jay Street Terminal, used as a public terminal of petitioners within the lighterage limits. We find the Federal Sugar Refining Co., with its refinery at Yonkers, 10 miles north of the lighterage limits, owning and operating no public terminal for petitioners and tendering petitioners no freight at any of their public terminals. So that we can not see how any violation of either section 2 or section 3 can be predicated on the facts stated in the record.

But it is claimed that this is true: That it costs the Federal Sugar Refining Co. 3 cents per hundred pounds more to get its sugar to the Jersey shore than it does Arbuckle Bros. This could be avoided in part if the Federal Sugar Refining Co. would tender its sugar for shipment over the rails of petitioners at any of the terminals of petitioners within the lighterage limits, many of which are much nearer Yonkers than the Jay Street Terminal or even Pier 24, North River. And we must not forget in this connection that the Federal Sugar Refining Co. voluntarily located its refinery at Yonkers, and if it thereby has subjected itself to some natural disadvantage it can not call upon the courts to remedy it. The commission recognized this fact when it refused to compel petitioners to extend their lighterage limits so as to include the Federal sugar refinery. It is apparent from the record that the sole disadvantage of the Federal Sugar Refining Co. results from its location outside the lighterage limits, and that it is in no way injured or prejudiced by the fact that Arbuckle Bros. own the Jay Street Terminal.

For the reasons above stated we are of the opinion that the order of the commission was in excess of its power, and that it ought to be permanently suspended and enjoined. And it is so ordered.

Mack, Judge, dissenting:

The commission in its report does not clearly indicate whether it deems the transportation of the Arbuckle sugar to begin in New York or in Jersey City. It is conceded by counsel that this is a question of law to be determined by this court. As to goods shipped by Arbuckle Bros. to others than themselves as consignees, there would seem to be no room for doubt, for whatever may be the liability of the Jay Street Terminal toward such consignees, clearly the railroad companies are liable to them as common carriers at the latest from the time of the delivery of the goods into the cars and the issuance of the bill of lading in their name by their authorized agents in New York. I concur in the conclusion of the majority of the court that this transportation begins in New York.

As to the comparatively small percentage of shipments of which Arbuckle Bros. are the consignees as well as the consignors, this would seem to be equally true. The title thereto could be transferred by them immediately after the bills of lading are issued, and in that event the railroad companies would again clearly be liable as carriers to the assignees, even though the goods had not yet actually moved from New York. And the retention of title thereto by Arbuckle Bros. during the time that they, acting as agents for the railroad companies, are transporting them to Jersey City under the contract by which they agree to indemnify the railroad companies against their own acts, and thereby to release them, in a sense, from the obligations which they would ordinarily incur as common carriers toward the owners of goods carried, would not of itself change the transaction from a transportation service performed by the railroads through their agents, the shippers, into an accessorial service performed by the shippers solely on their own account, payment for which would be illegal, irrespective of any unjust discrimination that might result therefrom.

I concur, too, in the opinion of the majority of the court that Arbuckle Bros. and the Jay Street Terminal are to be treated as identical. When two individuals form two firms in which each is interested in the same proportions, the one to refine sugar, the other to operate a terminal station and to transport goods for railroads, the two firms do not thereby become so distinct and separate for every purpose as to legalize a payment to the latter firm for carrying the former's product, if such payment would be illegal as unjustly discriminatory when made directly to the former firm. The commission was, therefore, fully justified in this case in dealing with the two firms as one.

The question before this court then is, Could the commission reasonably find that payment to Arbuckle Bros. for getting sugar manufactured by them from a point within the lighterage limits to Jersey City; that is, for performing a part of the railroad companies' transportation service (a payment permitted by section 15 of the act, subject to regulation by the commission as to its reasonableness), would operate as an unjust discrimination against the Federal Sugar Refining Co. unless a similar payment were made to the latter company for getting sugar manufactured by it from another point within the lighterage limits to Jersey City?

If the Federal Co. had its refinery at Pier 24, and if Arbuckle Bros. operated their wharf only as a private and not as a public station, and if the allowance made to them for carrying their sugar to Jersey City were no more than the bare cost of the service, the commission would be justified in finding that a refusal to make a similar allowance to the Federal Co. and the offer to give it in lieu thereof free lighterage of its sugar would result in an unjust discrimination against the Federal Co. (Union Pacific Railroad Co. v. Updike Grain Co., 222 U. S., 215.)

Do the facts, first, that the Federal Co.'s refinery is at Yonkers, that it brings its goods to Pier 24 primarily or solely to get them within the lighterage limits, that it has never demanded and does not want free lighterage from Pier 24, and that as a result thereof the transportation of its goods by the railroads begins in Jersey City; or, second, that Arbuckle Bros. are employed by the carriers to operate their wharf as a public terminal station, and to transport therefrom to Jersey City not only their own but others' goods, necessarily render the circumstances such that the commission in the reasonable exercise of its powers could not find them to be substantially similar?

(1) If this case were based on the grant of free lighterage to Arbuckle Bros. and the failure to grant it to the Federal Co., the latter would, of course, have no ground for complaint unless it really wanted and offered to avail itself of such free lighterage. But when, as here, the complaint is based on the grant to the one and the denial to the other of the privilege, not of free lighterage, but of itself performing for compensation the transportation service from within the lighterage limits to Jersey City, it is no answer to assert that at present the situation of the two parties is not similar, transportation for the one beginning at New York and for the other at Jersey City. The charge is that this dissimilarity is due not to the voluntary act of the parties but to the very discrimination sought to be removed as unjust, and that if the same privilege were granted the Federal Co. as is granted Arbuckle Bros.—that is, to transport its goods from a point in the lighterage limits to Jersey City in its own or hired lighters, not at its cost, but as the compensated agent of the railroads—it would be ready, willing, and able so to do.

If this court must find that there is no substantial basis for the commission's view that the Federal Co. was shipping and, on a grant of like privileges to those accorded Arbuckle Bros., would be ready to ship from Pier 24, if the facts stated in the petition necessarily lead to the conclusion that the shipment is and would be direct from Yonkers, a point without, and not from Pier 24, a point within the lighterage limits, to Jersey City, there would be an end of the case. I am of the opinion, however, that this court should not so hold.

The railroads are not concerned with the history of goods offered for transportation. (Interstate Commerce Commission v. D., L. & W. R. Co., 220 U. S., 235.) If parties are ready to perform for compensation that part of the service which the railroad companies by their offer to begin the carriage in New York instead of in New Jersey have made transportation service, it can not be material to the railroads how the goods get to the point where this service is to begin—whether it be by rail, barge, or wagon. The goods are to be tendered to them at that point. The only transportation with which we are here concerned, that by the railroads, is to begin there.

The barge that brings the Federal Co.'s sugar from Yonkers is tied up to the dock at Pier 24. The sugar is then just as much within the lighterage limits as if it were dumped out on the pier. When the barge is so tied up a shipper who wants to avail himself of the free-lighterage offer could assuredly do so. The railroads make this offer to the Federal Co. now, an offer which would be illegal if the goods could not be considered to be within the lighterage limits and if the interstate transportation necessarily began at Yonkers. If the refinery were situated in New York City, a few blocks off the water front on a small canal or creek large enough only for rowboats, the company clearly could bring its goods by such a boat to the dock and put them on lighters without first dumping them onto the dock.

Of course, at the present time the Federal Co. can not offer the goods to the railroads at Pier 24. As it does not want free lighterage, and as the railroads will not accept them at Pier 24 by issuing, through regular agents or through the Federal Co. itself, acting as their agent, the necessary bills of lading, and permitting the Federal Co. as their paid agent thence to transport them to Jersey City under covenants similar to those found in the Jay Street Terminal contracts, it would seem to be utterly useless for the Federal Co. to do anything more than it is doing. It says: "Our sugar is at Pier 24; it is already loaded in lighters; we want bills of lading for the through transportation from this point, and we demand, for similar compensation, the privilege of performing a part of the transportation service, that between the lighterage point, Pier 24, and Jersey City, a privilege substantially similar to that which you grant Arbuckle Bros."

In the opinion filed by the commission in the original case brought by the Federal Co., involving only the extension of the lighterage limits and based primarily on an alleged violation of section 3 of the act, importance was attached to the concession of counsel that the Federal Co. would not be any better off if the Jay Street Terminal were owned by the railroad companies, with the implication that in that event the allowance would be cut off and only free lighterage granted. The refinery at Yonkers would, of course, always be under the disadvantage of having to bring its goods to Pier 24.

The present proceeding, however, was brought by the Federal Co. not in the capacity of Yonkers refinery, primarily to prevent, as between localities, the undue prejudice forbidden by section 3, but in its capacity of a vendor and shipper of sugar from Pier 24, primarily to prevent as against it the unjust discrimination forbidden by section 2 of the act. Only in that capacity is it to be dealt with in this case, and therefore it is immaterial how, whence, or at what cost it gets its sugar to that pier.

(2) Can parties guilty of what would otherwise be an unjust discrimination escape the consequences of their act by combining the payment for the transportation service with payment for other work that in and of itself has no necesary connection therewith?

That Arbuckle Bros. run a public wharf as agents of the railroad companies, that their compensation is a combination of rent and wages as terminal managers and transporters, that the amount paid per 100 pounds for sugar may be far beyond a fair payment for that particular service, and may be made so because a similar payment per 100 pounds may be far below a fair payment for similar services as to other goods, do not, in my judgment, necessarily render the circumstances surrounding the transportation of the sugar to Jersey City so dissimilar from those at Pier 24 as to justify this court in holding that the commission, in the reasonable exercise of its powers, could not find that an unjust discrimination resulted from the payment to Arbuckle Bros. and the refusal to make a similar payment to the Federal Co. If the commission could reasonably so find, its order can not be annulled merely because the members of this court might have reached a different conclusion had they been acting as commissioners.

The fact that the contracts between the Jay Street Terminal and the railroads, by which the Arbuckle private docks were made public terminal stations and these allowances were definitely fixed, were made during the session of Congress which enacted the Hepburn Act, a law which aimed more effectively to prevent certain illegal practices theretofore secretly indulged in for the benefit of large and favored shippers, and the further fact that the ultimate destination of the goods determined the rate of payment, although the services in each case were absolutely identical, lends support to the conclusions of the commission that the allowances are a mere disguise to conceal unjustly discriminatory and therefore illegal payments.

In my judgment, the petition should be dismissed for want of equity.

Mr. SIMPSON. I also offer in evidence the opinion of the Supreme Court in the fuel rate case, which will have to be copied out of the book I have here, which comes from the library connected with the Senate. It is Two hundred and twenty-fifth United States, page 326.

The opinion referred to is as follows:

[U. S. S. Exhibit AAA.]

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

(No. 719.—October term, 1911.)

The Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States, appellants, v. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., et al. Appeal from the United States Commerce Court.

(June 7, 1912.)

The question in the case is whether railroad companies may charge a different rate for the transportation of coal to a given point to railroads than to other shippers, the coal being intended for the use of the railroads as fuel.

The Interstate Commerce Commission held that a charge of a different rate was an unlawful discrimination against other shippers and made an order requiring a cessation of such charge. The execution of the order was enjoined by the Commerce Court.

A number of railroads are petitioners and we shall refer to them as the companies.

The companies attack in their petition the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission on several grounds, which may be summarized as follows: The movement of coal traffic from the point of origin to the point or points of junction to receiving carriers is different from the movement of coal to be delivered locally at such junction points.

The traffic is not governed by the rates published under the act to regulate commerce which apply to the traffic in coal not intended for use by consuming railroads, because the charges go to the carrier itself. If the coal be shipped under a through rate applicable to other coal the actual rate upon which it moves to the rails of the consuming road is the division of the through rate going to the roads over which the traffic moves to the junction point with the rails of the consuming road. The division of the rate beyond that point goes to the consuming road itself.

All but an inconsiderable part of such coal is necessary and intended for use as fuel in locomotives. The fueling stations are often many, and are located at convenient points along the line at varying distances from the junction points, and it is not possible at the time of shipment to tell at what point a carload of coal will be needed. If made on a through rate they must be billed and transported to a point to which the through rate is published. Even if a centrally located distributing yard for fuel be established, and all shipments billed on a through rate to that yard, there must be a reverse movement of the coal between that point and the point of junction.

The fact that fuel coal on the line of a consuming carrier is not governed by the published rates makes the commercial competitive conditions different between such coal and other coal. The value to the shipper is not the same or measured by the same conditions. There is no competition between the fuel coal and other coal.

Because of the circumstances and conditions differentiating the traffic in fuel coal the companies have for a number of years past published and filed, as required by law, separate tariffs of the rates to be charged and received by them for the transportation of such coal from points of origin to the junction point of delivery to the consuming carrier. The tariffs vary in their definitions or descriptions of the traffic to which the rates apply, but in each case the traffic is such that it would move in reality not under the published through rates but would move under the special conditions which have been stated. Some of the tariffs apply only to coal intended for use and used for locomotive fuel. The rates named in the tariffs are open and available to all producers and shippers, if the shipments be made under the special conditions stated.

On January 4, 1910, the Interstate Commerce Commission, of its own motion, instituted an inquiry under an order of that date entitled, "In the matter of restrictive rates," docket No. 3053, making the Baltimore & Ohio and the Pennsylvania Railroad Cos. parties to the proceeding. The other companies from time to time were admitted as interveners. Testimony was taken, argument heard, and the commission entered the order complained of in which the commission required the companies to cease and desist, on or before May 15, 1911, and for a period of two years to abstain from using the tariffs on fuel coal stated.

The commission erred in its construction of the act to regulate commerce in that it held the facts and circumstances found by it did not distinguish fuel coal from other coal, and that the different conditions of their transportation were not in law circumstances and conditions necessary or proper to be considered in applying the provisions of section 2 of the act.

The commission erred in holding that the rates on fuel coal under section 2 should be no more nor less than rates for the shipment of other coal from the same point of origin for local delivery at the junction point, the circumstances and conditions showing conclusively that the services done in the transportation of them, respectively, are not alike nor substantially similar, within the meaning of the act to regulate commerce.

The commission erred in holding that fuel coal should be transported under through rates, as other coal, and that it was unlawful for carriers to publish or charge any rates other than the through rates agreed upon going to the line of the terminal carrier to be used by it in its business as a common carrier. And that, as the charges on such terminal carrier's line must be borne by it, the commission erred in holding that such circumstance did not differentiate the traffic in such coal from the traffic in other coal, and did not constitute a substantial difference under section 2 in the conditions of transportation.

The commission erred in holding, further, that any difference in the tariff for fuel coal and not applicable to all other coal was unjustly discriminatory, in violation of section 3.

It appears on the face of the report of the commission, it is alleged, that it proceeded in making the order upon its view of sections 2 and 3; that it did not find it necessary to consider any specific tariff or tariffs or the rates named thereby; that the difference in conditions affecting the respective tariffs could not be considered as distinguishing them. And it is alleged that the findings of the commission are findings of law, as well in regard to the violation of the third section of the act as in regard to violation of the second section. Irreparable damage is alleged, and the alternatives presented of desisting from the carriage of fuel coal at the expense of the loss of large and valuable revenues or accepting divisions of through rates on both fuel coal and other coal, which will give the companies, as originating or intermediate carriers, a much lower compensation for both classes of traffic than they are now receiving and would continue to receive but for the order of the commission.

In either case the loss will amount to many thousand dollars. There will be loss, it is alleged, to the producers of fuel coal who have sold coal under contracts for future delivery at junction points, and loss also to producers and shippers who depend on the railroad-fuel business to enable them to operate their mines at all.

A final decree is prayed for the annulment of the order and a temporary injunction enjoining and suspending it pending final hearing and determination.

The petition was supported by affidavits made by a number of coal producers and shippers.

The answer of the Interstate Commerce Commission is directed principally at the third paragraph of the petition, and charges against it as follows: Its allegations relate to comparisons between coal, on the one hand, consigned to a railroad company, and coal, on the other hand, consigned to some other party. The former is called railroad-fuel coal; the latter is known as commercial coal. In each instance, however, regardless of the consignee, the point of origin and the point of destination of the shipments is the same, but the rate charged for transporting fuel coal is much less than the rate exacted for the transportation of commercial coal over the same line, in the same direction, and between the same points. Schedules or tariffs providing for such differences in rates have been heretofore established and put in force and are now maintained and enforced by the companies.

Where the destination is a junction which is a point of connection between the lines of two or more of the companies, the movement of coal, fuel and commercial, is the same, except that at such destination the cars containing fuel coal are ordinarily placed upon what is called an exchange track, which is used in common by the connecting carriers, while the cars containing commercial coal are usually placed upon the side track of the delivering carrier. The cost of delivering both kinds of coal is practically the same, depending upon the nature of the delivery facilities furnished by the companies. Therefore, the cost of delivering fuel coal may be and is less than the cost of delivering the commercial coal, but the reverse is sometimes the case. It is alleged, however, that such differences are similar to differences pertaining to some shipments of commercial coal compared with other shipments.

Generally what is called "free time" is allowed by the companies; that is to say, a certain period of time for unloading the coal is allowed. If the coal is unloaded within that time, no charge is made for the use of the car. If that time be exceeded, a charge of $1 for each day or fraction of a day in excess of the "free time," known as a demurrage charge, is exacted by the companies, while the compensation paid by one carrier to another carrier for the use of a car owned by the latter is 25 cents a day. Where the coal transported is fuel coal no "free time" is allowed, nor is such demurrage charge exacted or collected. These differences, however, are offset, and much more than offset, by the differences in the rates of transportation between the different coals.

Where the destination of the shipment of coal is not a point of connection between the lines of two or more of the companies the circumstances and conditions pertaining to the transportation and delivery of coal are the same as above described, except that at such destination there are no exchange tracks used in common by two or more of the companies. Where the shipment passes over more than one line of railway to such destination, delivery by one of the companies to another is made in the same way and under similar circumstances and conditions, regardless of whether the coal be fuel or commercial.

The lower rates established by the companies and applied by them to the transportation of fuel coal are not open alike to all shippers, but are, by reason of the schedules and tariffs above mentioned and by reason of the practices of the companies, confined to shippers of fuel coal and denied to shippers of all other coal, including commercial coal.

The commission denies the errors attributed to it, and alleges that its report shows as follows: "We have never held that the local rate to the junction point must be paid on shipments that are going beyond that point. What we have said is that the local rate to the junction point shall be the same for all shippers to that point, and that the through charges on shipments going beyond the junction point shall be alike for all shippers to the same destination."

The commission alleges (somewhat singularly, on information and belief) that it considered all facts, circumstances, and conditions pertinent to the subject matter of the order, including degrees of difference and distinction, and each and all of the tariffs and rates of the companies which are affected by the order, and did not entertain the opinion attributed to it, that the facts, circumstances, and conditions affecting the particular traffic could not be lawfully considered by it as distinguishing the traffic in railroad-fuel coal from the traffic in other coal.

It is alleged that the traffic is interstate, and that fuel coal as compared with other coal, including commercial coal, is a like kind of traffic; that the services performed by the companies in connection with the transportation of fuel coal as compared to the services performed by them in connection with the transportation of other coal, including commercial coal, are alike and contemporaneous, and are performed under substantially similar circumstances and conditions. It is hence alleged that the companies are violating sections 2 and 3 of the interstate-commerce act.

The final allegation of the commission is that the matters are within its jurisdiction, and that therefore the correctness of its findings is not open to review in the Commerce Court or any other court.

Mr. Justice McKenna, after stating the case as above, delivered the opinion of the court:

The case involves the consideration of sections 2 and 3 of the interstate-commerce act. Section 2 provides that if any common carrier shall directly or indirectly charge or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation than it charges or receives from any other person or persons "for doing for him or them a like and contemporaneous service in the transportation of a like kind of traffic, under sustantially similar circumstances and conditions, such common carrier shall be deemed guilty of discrimination. * * *."

Section 3 is directed against giving preferences or advantages to persons, localities, or descriptions of traffic in any respect whatsoever and subjecting any person, locality, or traffic "to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever."

The companies contend that the commission applied these sections to the facts found by the commission, none of them being disputed, and that, therefore, the findings of the commission are conclusions of law. On the other hand, the commission charges that its findings are those of fact and exclusively within its jurisdiction, and not open to review by the Commerce Court or any court. Many of its assignments of error are expressions of this view. The other assignments assert in various ways and with many shades of particularity that the Commerce Court erred in disagreeing with the commission in regard to the traffics in the different coals, not only in its decision, as indicated in its injunction, in the matters affecting such traffic, but in substituting its judgment for that of the commission.

The facts are certainly undisputed, or, to put it differently, the circumstances and conditions which determined the order are certainly not in controversy; and while certain general inferences are disputed which may be called inferences of fact, yet we think "power to make the order, and not the mere expediency of having made it, is the question" presented. (Interstate Commerce Commission v. Illinois Central R. R. Co., 215 U. S., 452, 470.) In other words, that the question presented by the petition is that the order of the commission was not merely administrative, but proceeded from a construction of sections 2 and 3 as applicable to the conditions which affected the traffic in the different kinds of coal and that the different charges for transportation constituted violations of those sections. The Commerce Court, therefore, had jurisdiction of the petition and jurisdiction to enjoin the order of the commission if the court considered that the order would cause irreparable injury. Section 3 of the act creating the Commerce Court gives that court the power to "enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in a suit brought in the court against the United States." Whether the court erred in its judgment is now to be inquired into.

In its most abstract form the simple statement of the controversy is whether the companies may charge a different rate for the transportation of fuel coal to a given point than for the transportation of commercial coal to the same point. But when we depart from the abstract, complexities appear and attention is carried beyond the consideration of points equally distant, shippers equally circumstanced and traffic affected by similar circumstances and conditions. It is asserted that there are disparities between the traffics and qualifying circumstances which the commission disregarded and, in error, held that traffic in fuel coal should not be distinguished from the traffic in commercial coal.

The commission insists upon the simplicity of the problem and contends that there is nothing in the conditions of the traffic which dispenses with the clear legal duty of the companies under the interstate commerce act to carry for all shippers alike. The commission says: "We have never held that the local rate to the junction point must be paid on shipments that are going beyond that point. What we have said is that the local rate to the junction point shall be the same for all shippers to that point, and that the through charges on shipments going beyond the junction point shall be alike for all shippers to the same destination." Its position thus expressed the commission has supplemented, we are told by the companies, by its conference ruling No. 324, published June 19, 1911, as follows: "Division on company coal.—Upon inquiry, held that it is unlawful for carriers to make special and discriminatory divisions of joint rates upon locomotive fuel as between an originating or participating carrier and a purchasing carrier. In the division of joint rates a railroad must be treated precisely as any other shipper is treated, and the commission will regard any special division as a device to defeat the published rate. All divisions upon fuel coal must be made in good faith without respect to the fact that one of the carriers is the purchaser of such coal."

The issue of principle between the commission and the companies is very accurately presented, and we come to consider whether there are differences in the traffic of fuel coal which distinguish it from traffic in commercial coal, and which, as contended by the companies, make the traffic dissimilar in circumstances and conditions, or whether the opposite is true, as decided by the commission.

The circumstances and conditions which may so far be considered as distinguishing traffics so as to take from different transportation charges the vice of preference have been described by this court. In Wight v. United States (167 U. S., 512, 518) it is said: "It was the purpose of the section (2) to enforce equality between shippers, and it prohibits any rebate or other device by which two shippers, shipping over the same line, the same distance, under the same circumstances of carriage, are compelled to pay different prices therefor." These words are given more precision by the declaration "that the phrase, 'under substantially similar circumstances and conditions,' as found in section 2, refers to matters of carriage, and does not include competition." And this was repeated in Interstate Commerce Commission v. Alabama Midland Railway Co. (168 U. S., 161, 166). The facts in both cases give significance to the rulings. In the first case the charges to the shippers were the same, but one was given extra facilities; in the second case the extraneous effect of competition was excluded as an element in the application of the section. There is also example in Interstate Commerce Commission v. Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. (220 U. S., 235). It was there held that a carrier could not look beyond goods tendered to it for transportation in carload lots "to the ownership of the shipment" as the basis for determining the application of its established rates. Do the circumstances and conditions in this case give a greater power of discrimination and justify the lower charge to railroad-fuel coal? It is admitted that the fact that a railroad is the shipper or consumer is not a circumstance or condition that affects the carriage, nor can the different uses to which the coal may be put, and it would seem necessarily that any other extraneous condition or circumstance could have no greater potency. Once depart from the clear directness of what relates to the carriage only and we may let in considerations which may become a cover for preferences. May a carrier look beyond the service it is called upon to render to the attitude and interest of the shippers before, or their attitude and interest after, transportation? It must be kept in mind that it is not the relation of one railroad to another with which we have any concern, but the relation of a railroad to its patrons, who are entitled to equality of charges. (See Pennsylvania Railroad Co. v. International Mining Co., 173 Fed., 1.)

But what are the differences in the traffics which are asserted by the companies? We have already condensed them from the pleadings, but we may use the expression of their ultimate elements by the companies, omitting, for the time being, the physical differences in facilities. They say: "When the railroad-fuel coal is consigned to the junction point, as provided in the present system of tariffs, the circumstances and conditions that differentiate this traffic from the traffic in commercial coal consigned to the same point are:

"1. The fuel coal so shipped is not in competition with the commercial coal consigned to the same point.

"2. It is in competition with other coals coming upon the line of the consuming road at other points with which the commercial coal is not in competition.

"3. The transportation service is different in that commercial coal at the junction point has reached the point of use, while railroad-fuel coal reaching the consuming railroad at the junction point is still subject to a transportation service before reaching the point of use—a transportation under the 'commodities clause' and not under tariff."

These elements the commission disregarded, it is contended, and that while it found a similarity in the traffics it did not consider or discuss the two most important features of difference—"the two features" which make the traffics unlike; that is, that railroad-fuel coal "does not come into competition with the commercial coal, and is in competition with coals coming on the railroad's line at other points." But such features do not affect the carriage, quality, or alter the essential service, which is to get an article from one place to another. The greater or less inducement to seek the service is not the service. Such competition, therefore, is as extraneous to the transportation as the instances in the cases cited. And equally so is the other "feature," that the fuel coal may be destined for consumption beyond the junction point. The circumstances do not alter the fact that it and commercial coal go to the same point and are delivered at the same point. There is, it is true, a difference in the manner of delivery, depending upon the difference in the facilities possessed by the railroads and other consignees.

The commission, as we have seen, especially disclaimed holding that the rate to the junction point must be paid on shipments going beyond that point, and insisted that it only held that the charges to that point should be the same to all shippers, and rates through that point should also be the same to all shippers. And the commission said that the testimony established that the service as to the coals was alike when they go beyond the junction point. The commission, therefore, considered alone the service, disregarding circumstances and conditions which were mere accidents of it and had relation only to the respective shippers.

But the companies say, in criticism of the reasoning and order of the commission, they are permitted to do indirectly what they want to do directly, that an easy way of evasion of the prohibiting order is to make a joint rate from the point of origin of the fuel coal to its points of consumption, and thereby be enabled "to charge a lower rate for the fuel coal than for the commercial coal between the same points." And further, in display of the easiness with which this can be accomplished and "how readily the commission's order lends itself to manipulation of rates," they say that they have only to publish a nominal delivery point beyond the real delivery point, publish a rate to that point which they do not intend to charge and call their actual rate to the junction point, based on the special circumstances and conditions, a "division." They then ask if "the commission can so easily juggle a rate for a good purpose, will not ingenious traffic agents and coal operators do the same for their own perverse ends?" If such a situation artfully produced be used as a device for giving preferences, the commission might be able to find some means to defeat it. At present we must regard its possibility as relevant as exhibiting a misconception of the commission's purpose. The commission has not said what the rate should be, nor has it said, as we have seen, that the local rate to the junction point should be the same as the rate beyond that point. The commission has ordered equality and struck down what it deemed to be preferential charges, even though they were made under formal tariffs. If there may be legal or illegal evasion of the order, we may wonder at the controversy. If the difference between the effect of the order and what the companies can do or want to do, be, as is contended, a "question of words"—a "question of the nomenclature to be used in tariffs"—the order of the commission may still be valid. Tariffs are but forms of words, and certainly the commission, in the exercise of its powers to administer the interstate commerce act, can look beyond the forms to what caused them and what they are intended to cause and do cause.

There are other contentions or rather phases of those that we have considered and which seek to further emphasize the strength of competition as a circumstance or condition differentiating the traffic. For instance, it is urged that the shipment of the fuel coal to a particular railroad "for the use of that railroad" makes special the traffic. And, further, that "a railroad is not a person," but is "rather in the nature of a geographical division and extends through long distances." Pushing the argument or illustrations further, it is urged that a railroad company may be distinguished from the physical thing, the railroad itself, and may be a locality where a commodity is used, like "a river, a county, or a city," and be entitled to preferential rates to accommodate competitive conditions. The Import Rate Case (162 U. S., 197) is invoked as analogous. We can not accept the likeness nor the distinctions which are said to establish it. The railroad company can not be put out of view as a favored shipper, and we see many differences between such a shipper receiving coal for use in its locomotives and a nation as the destination of goods from other nations for distribution throughout its expanse on through rates from points of origin.

The point is made that "the commission's method of filing fuel-coal rates is illegal under section 6 of the interstate commerce act and under the Elkins Act," and the later act and section 6 are quoted in illustration. The rather vague argument which is urged to support the point lands in the proposition that the right to violate the law as to preference in rates is justified by the law in its requirement of the filing of schedules of rates. However, counsel say that "it all goes back to the same principle" "dealt with under point 1." We have sufficiently discussed point 1.

The decree of the Commerce Court is reversed and the case remanded with directions to dismiss the petition.

Mr. SIMPSON. I also offer in evidence a letter from Judge Mack to Mr. Bruce, dated December 12, 1911, and the reply of Mr. Bruce to Judge Mack, dated December 15, 1911, in relation to the Louisville & Nashville case, and the reply of Judge Mack to Mr. Bruce, dated December 22, 1911.

Mr. Manager STERLING. Those letters we ask to have read, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMPSON. Very good, sir. Before I offer any others, then, I will wait until they are read.

HELM BRUCE, Esq.,
Lincoln Bank Building, Louisville, Ky.

DEAR MR. BRUCE: In the testimony before the commission in the New Orleans-Mobile-Montgomery case Mr. Compton stated that he would furnish a copy of the Cooley adjustment of 1886. I can find nothing of this kind in the files. If you can secure me a copy of the Ogden and Cooley reports I should be greatly obliged to you.

Hon. JULIAN W. MACK,
Judge of the United States Commerce Court,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR JUDGE: I have yours of the 12th instant referring to Mr. Compton's testimony before the commission in the New Orleans-Mobile-Montgomery case and in which you call attention to the fact that he said he would furnish a copy of the Cooley adjustment of 1886, but that you can not find it.

You will find the Ogden and Cooley awards set forth in full in the testimony in the present case before the examiner of the circuit court, first, in the testimony of T. C. Powell, page 26, beginning at line 20, and then again in the testimony of Mr. C. B. Compton, page 152, line 1, et c.

But thinking it possible, as there are five judges of the Commerce Court, that you may not have the entire record before you, I inclose you a copy of the two awards.

Yours, very truly,

HELM BRUCE.

HELM BRUCE, Esq.,
Lincoln Bank Building, Louisville, Ky.

DEAR MR. BRUCE: Thanks for your letter and the inclosure. It has been some time since I went through the testimony in the circuit court, and when I wrote you I had forgotten that this material was there. I had been going again through the testimony before the commission and had failed to find it and had therefore made the request.

Thanking you for your courtesy, I am,

Very truly, yours,

JULIAN W. MACK.

Mr. SIMPSON. I also offer in evidence, sir, a letter from Mr. Bruce to Mr. Worthington, which was produced before the Judiciary Committee and kindly produced by the managers the other day at our request. That is the one Judge CLAYTON handed to me the other day.

Mr. Manager STERLING. We object to this—a letter written by Mr. Bruce to Mr. Worthington.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. This is a letter that Mr. Bruce wrote to me just after he had been examined as a witness before the Judiciary Committee, in which he makes some statements that he evidently wished to reach the committee in regard to this correspondence which he had with Judge Archbald. I turned it over to the committee, and it remained in their possession until it was produced here at our request. I think under the circumstances the Senate ought to have the benefit of Mr. Bruce's statement, which he made to the Judiciary Committee at the time in explanation of this transaction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does counsel claim that it is admissible under the rules of evidence?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I could hardly say it is strictly admissible, but I think, under the rules under which we have admitted some papers here, in general fairness to everybody it might go in.

My attention is called to the fact that in his testimony here Mr. Bruce was asked about that letter, and he said:

I think the facts I stated in that letter are material, if I may be permitted to say so, to this matter you have under consideration, because it states the attitude of the parties upon the question on which Judge Archbald wrote to me.

So it was referred to and made a part of his testimony here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not feel at liberty to admit a document if it is not regarded as legitimate evidence. Of course, if the Senate desires to receive it, it is in its power so to direct.

Mr. Manager WEBB. Mr. Bruce has been on the witness stand since writing the letter, and he could have been interrogated about it if it was desired to do so.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. WEBB forgets that the letter was mislaid by Judge CLAYTON and was not produced until next morning. It was no fault of Judge CLAYTON, and I am not making any complaint, but we did not have it here when we wanted it for that purpose.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. In reply to that, I may say that when counsel asked me for the letter I produced it as soon as possible. Mr. Bruce had not left the city. It is a matter which has no proper relation to the case, anyway.

Mr. SIMPSON. I do not think it is admissible evidence if it is objected to, and I can not insist on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would have no right to admit it.

Mr. SIMPSON. I offer in evidence the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. case, referred to by Judge Archbald while upon the stand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does counsel desire to have it read?

Mr. SIMPSON. I do not think it is necessary to have it read at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be incorporated in the record without being read.

The opinion referred to is as follows:

Before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

New Orleans Board of Trade (Limited) v. The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Nos. 1310, 1313, and 1328.

Submitted February 10, 1909. Decided November 26, 1909.

REPORT AND ORDER OF THE COMMISSION.

1. Defendant advanced its rates on certain classes from New Orleans to Mobile and Pensacola to make the sums of the locals equal the through rates from New Orleans to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville, via Mobile and Pensacola: Held, That the rates resulting from said advance were unjust and unreasonable.

2. Former rates have been in effect, substantially unchanged, for over twenty years, and there was no evidence that they were not compensatory.

3. Neither by comparison with other rates nor by any facts appearing are the advanced rates shown to be reasonable.

4. The through rates from New Orleans via Mobile and Pensacola to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville on certain classes held to be unreasonable and excessive and reduced to the sum of the locals.

John A. Smith, for complainant.

Ed. Baxter, W. G. Dearing, and Sloss D. Baxter, for defendant.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSION.

Clements, commissioner:

On August 13, 1907, the defendant advanced its rates on certain classes from New Orleans, La., to Mobile, Ala., and Pensacola, Fla., and on the same date a revision of the tariffs of said defendant became effective, which resulted in an increase of rates upon certain commodities and a decrease in rates upon certain other commodities from the same point of origin to the same destinations.

The complainant attacks the advanced rates on traffic to each of these destinations in separate proceedings as unreasonable and unjust in and of themselves, and as unduly prejudicial to the commercial interests of the city of New Orleans and its merchants.

The complainant also attacks, in a separate proceeding, the through rates from New Orleans to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville, Ala., on substantially the same grounds.

The defendant, admitting the advance in its rates substantially as alleged, denies that they, or any of them, are unreasonable or unjust.

The three cases are interdependent, in that attack upon the local rates from New Orleans to Mobile and Pensacola, respectively, involves the through rates from New Orleans to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville, and the attack upon the said through rates from New Orleans to these Alabama destinations involves the local rates from New Orleans to Mobile and Pensacola. The three cases were heard together and will be disposed of in a single report.

The advances in the class rates to Mobile and to Pensacola, respectively, as follows:

Freight transported over defendant's lines from New Orleans to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville, and adjacent territory basing upon these points, is routed via Mobile or Pensacola, and prior to August 13, 1907, defendant's through rates from New Orleans to said points, in certain instances, exceeded the sum of the locals from New Orleans to Mobile or Pensacola added to the local rates from these points to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville.

The excess of the through rates over the sums of the locals was exactly identical in each instance with the advances as shown by the above tables, namely, in classes 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and E to Mobile, and in classes 3, 4, 5, and 6 to Pensacola.

The following table shows the difference between the through rates and the combinations prior to said advances:

The effect of the advance was to equalize the sum of the locals with the through rates from New Orleans to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville, but the through rates from New Orleans to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville were not changed, nor were the local rates from Mobile and Pensacola to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville disturbed.

Prior to August 13, 1907, shippers, in order to get the benefit of the lower combination, sometimes shipped locally to Mobile and then reshipped to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville.

The defendant concedes that one of the objects of the advance was to keep the locals from being used to cut the through rate, and the evidence corroborates this position, and it is obvious that this was the underlying reason for the advance.

Transportation between New Orleans, Mobile, and Pensacola was conducted wholly by water carriers until about 1871, when carriage by rail was inaugurated, and shortly thereafter the defendant acquired the railroad which had been built from New Orleans to Mobile and Pensacola, and has operated the same continuously to the present time as a part of its system.

The earliest rail class rates applying via this route, as shown by this record, were established in 1887, and they remained substantially unchanged until the said advance of August 13, 1907. Comparison of water rates issued by the Mobile & Gulf Steamship Co., effective in 1907, and the rail rates prior to the said advance, from New Orleans to Mobile, is shown as follows:

	Class.
	1	2	3	4	5	6	A	B	C	D	E	H	F
Rail rates	50	37	25	18	15	15	12	15	12½	10	15	18	25
Water rates	44	33	31	27	23	12	10	12	13	8	16	14	10

In the competition between the rail and water lines the tariffs show the rail rates ranged generally higher than the water rates, except in the third, fourth, and fifth classes, under which classes the bulk of the freight carried between these two cities would move. There was some testimony to the effect that formerly the rail rates were not maintained as published when competition was severe with the water lines, neither is it certain that the rates announced by the water lines were maintained. At all events, water transportation gradually declined, and at the date of the hearing carriage by water was very infrequent and cut but little figure as a competitor with the defendant. Some of the reasons for the decline and practical disappearance of water transportation, as disclosed by the testimony in this case, in addition to the results of the competition with defendant, are the slower service of the water lines, the labor troubles in connection with loading and unloading the vessels, inconvenient loading and unloading places for shippers as compared with centrally located freight stations and branch railroads to warehouses, and the want of proper docking facilities.

The advances shown from New Orleans to Mobile of 2 cents on the second class, 13 on the third, 13 on the fourth, 12 on the fifth, 1 on the sixth, and 5 on class E were severely felt by certain shippers in New Orleans shipping to Mobile and adjacent territory, and especially those engaged in jobbing canned goods, lard, flour, coffee, oil, crackers, pickles, vinegar, beans, etc. New Orleans is an important distributing market for canned beans, handling, perhaps, from 400 to 500 carloads per year, and the increase in the rate on this article is extremely burdensome, if not practically prohibitory of shipping into New Orleans and out to Mobile.

The rate on paper was advanced from 18 to 31 cents, and that on stovepipe, tinware, tubs, and galvanized iron tubes from 18 to 31 cents, and it was shown that the manufacturers would have to absorb this advance. It was also shown that the advance of the rates on furniture, iron beds, etc., practically closed out the business with Mobile, as better rates were made from other manufacturing points, such as Atlanta, High Point, and Winston-Salem, N. C.

The rates on bags, burlaps, gunny, and jute were advanced L. C. L. from 15 to 27 cents, and this was vigorously opposed. Strong protest on account of alleged discrimination against New Orleans was made with reference to cotton goods, it being asserted that other manufacturing points are given more favorable rates. Some of the rates upon cotton goods are as follows:

New Orleans to Montgomery, 321 miles, 55 cents; Montgomery to New Orleans, 38 cents; New Orleans to Mobile, 141 miles, 31 cents; Mobile to New Orleans, 18 cents; from Virginia and North and South Carolina points to Montgomery the rate is 43 and 46 cents; Augusta to Montgomery, 346 miles, 35 cents; Augusta to Mobile, 536 miles, 40 cents; New York to Montgomery, 69 cents; Boston to Montgomery, 69 cents; New York to Mobile, via water, 40 cents; Boston to Mobile, via water, 40 cents; New York to New Orleans, via water, 40 cents; New Orleans to New York, via water, 30 cents.

In many other instances on both class and commodity rates the advances caused serious interference with business and have produced loud protests on the part of the merchants shipping from New Orleans to Mobile and points basing thereon.

The advance of the rates from New Orleans to Pensacola was as follows:

Three cents in the third class, 6 cents in the fourth, 7 cents in the fifth, and 1 cent in the sixth class. This advance was not as heavy or as injurious to the merchants in New Orleans in their trade with Pensacola as the advance to Mobile, but they strongly protested against it, and it was shown that, proportionately, like conditions resulted from said advance as were produced by the increase in the rates to Mobile.

The rates from New Orleans to Mobile and Pensacola have been in effect, substantially unchanged, for over 20 years, and there was no evidence that they were not compensatory. They exceed the rates from New Orleans to other water transportation points, e. g., Natchez, Vicksburg, Greenville, and Memphis, where the distances are much greater. They also exceed the rates from Nashville, Memphis, Cincinnati, and Louisville to points where the distances are approximately the same. The rates between New Orleans and Mobile and New Orleans and Pensacola in both directions were identical until this advance occurred, which has disturbed the relation of rates between points where geographical and commercial conditions would seem to demand that they be put on an equality, not only with respect to the trade and commerce with each other, but also with respect to the outbound rates to the southeastern territory. Between other cities, e. g., New Orleans and Memphis, New Orleans and Greenville, New Orleans and Natchez, New Orleans and Vicksburg, the rates are the same in both directions.

With respect to the through rates from New Orleans to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville, and to the southeastern territory, it was shown that the merchants of New Orleans have heretofore made ineffectual efforts to secure better rates to this territory, as higher rates were in effect from New Orleans to this territory than existed from distributing centers at greater distances west and north of said territory, the situation being such that New Orleans was cut off from the trade of this section as to many products and greatly restricted and burdened as to many others on account of the high rates of transportation.

The manufacturers and shippers of oil, paper, stovepipe, tinware, galvanized tube, furniture, soap, window glass, paints, hardware, and other articles of like kind in daily use testified that they were unable to trade in the Montgomery and Selma territory on account of the high rates, and that upon former occasions they had made special efforts to build up a trade with cities located in this territory and points basing thereon, but in every instance they were compelled to abandon the fight on account of better freight rate concessions from other markets, though at greater distances.

With respect to practically all of the commodities above enumerated, schedules of comparative rates and distances were filed corroborating complainant's contention.

The rates from New Orleans to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville are higher in all the classes than the rates from other points typical of the situation in the southeast to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville, where the distances are greater, e. g., Brunswick, Ga.; Savannah, Ga.; Charleston, S. C.; Wilmington, N. C.; and Nashville, Tenn. From New Orleans to certain stations just outside of Montgomery, on the Mobile & Ohio Railroad, the rates are less than the rates to Montgomery, and from some of the Virginia cities to Montgomery and Selma the rates are less than from New Orleans to Montgomery and Selma, though more than twice the distance. The rates from North Atlantic ports to points in southeastern territory basing on Montgomery are more favored when length of haul and the number of lines over which the traffic must be transported are taken into consideration, and the rate in cents per ton per mile on the average of the first six classes is much greater from New Orleans to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville than they are from Memphis, St. Louis, and Louisville to said points.

The Cooley arbitration of 1886 has been strongly urged by defendant as a reason for the nonreduction of the present advanced rates. This arbitration established a relation of rates as between the several Ohio and Mississippi River crossings, applying upon products from the territory north and west of those rivers destined to southern and southeastern territory, by fixing a basis for making rates from these several basing points to the southeastern territory with the object of maintaining an equitable relation and equality of the basing rate as between said points on goods transported to southeastern territory, but we do not understand that this arbitration undertook to fix the actual rates for carriage from the several basing points to destinations in this territory. However, if such were the case, the building of new railroads, competition, and other causes have forced many departures from the adjustment and the rates made under it, until it has become materially altered, and it is inevitable and proper that it should yield to meet new and changed conditions.

It was stated by the principal witness for the defendant that between points on its line where the through rate exceeded the combination of rates from point of origin to a competitive point and from said competitive point to destination that shippers were given the benefit of the combination rate, and this provision appeared in special circulars and was very generally observed as a rule for the adjustment of freight rates; and such having been formerly the custom of the defendant, it would seem now to work no especial hardship upon it to reduce rates to the basis of the former combination.

Upon full hearing and consideration of all the facts, circumstances, and conditions appearing, it is the opinion of the commission that the advance in these rates upon classes 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and E, from New Orleans to Mobile, and upon classes 3, 4, 5, and 6, from New Orleans to Pensacola, effective August 13, 1907, was not justified, and that the increased rates resulting therefrom are unjust and unreasonable to the extent that they exceed the former rates in effect immediately prior to August 13, 1907, on the said classes.

The commission is also of the opinion that the through rates heretofore stated, in effect from New Orleans to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville, on traffic moving through Mobile to said destinations, are unreasonable and unjust as applied to said classes to the extent that said through rates exceed the combination of locals from New Orleans to Mobile and from Mobile to said destinations, immediately prior to August 13, 1907, viz: Class 2, 2 cents; class 3, 13 cents; class 4, 13 cents; class 5, 12 cents; class 6, 1 cent; and class E, 5 cents; also that the through rates from New Orleans to Montgomery, Selma, and Pratt-ville, on traffic moving through Pensacola and thence to said destinations, are unjust and unreasonable to the extent that they exceed the amounts of the combination of locals from New Orleans to Pensacola and and from Pensacola to said destinations, respectively, which were in effect immediately prior to August 13, 1907, viz: Class 3, 3 cents; class 4, 6 cents; class 5, 7 cents; and class 6, 1 cent.

It is our conclusion, therefore, that the rates on classes 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and E, from New Orleans to Mobile, should not exceed the following sums: Second class, 37 cents; third class, 25 cents; fourth class, 18 cents; fifth class, 15 cents; sixth class, 15 cents; class E, 15 cents; that the rates on classes 3, 4, 5, and 6, from New Orleans to Pensacola, should not exceed the following amounts: Class 3, 35 cents; class 4, 25 cents; class 5, 20 cents; class 6, 15 cents; that the rates on classes 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and E, from New Orleans via Mobile to Montgomery and Selma, should not exceed the following amounts: Second class, 77 cents; third class, 55 cents; fourth class, 42 cents; fifth class, 35 cents; sixth class, 35 cents; Class E, 39 cents; and from New Orleans via Mobile to Prattville should not exceed the following amounts: Class 2, 87 cents; class 3, 63 cents; class 4, 50 cents; class 5, 43 cents; class 6, 43 cents; and class E, 44 cents; and that the rate from New Orleans via Pensacola to Montgomery and Selma should not exceed the following amounts: Class 3, 65 cents; class 4, 49 cents; class 5, 40 cents; and class 6, 35 cents; and that the rates from New Orleans via Pensacola to Prattville should not exceed the following amounts: Class 3, 73 cents; class 4, 57 cents; class 5, 48 cents; and class 6, 43 cents.

In regard to the commodity rates attacked in these proceedings certain adjustments and changes have been made therein by the defendant since the institution thereof with the view of correcting inequalities or excessive charges found to exist, which adjustments and changes are admitted to have removed the cause of complaint to some extent. It is impracticable in the present state of the record to determine satisfactorily what other changes, if any, respecting commodity rates should be made. These cases will be retained therefore for such further investigation and consideration of commodity rates involved as the facts and circumstances may seem to require.

An order will be entered in accordance with the foregoing conclusions.

These cases being at issue upon complaints and answers on file, and having been duly heard and submitted by the parties, and full investigation of the matters and things involved having been had, and the commission being of the opinion that the advance in these rates upon classes 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and E, from New Orleans to Mobile, and upon classes 3, 4, 5, and 6 from New Orleans to Pensacola, effective August 13, 1907, was not justified, and that the increased rates resulting therefrom are unjust and unreasonable to the extent that they exceed the former rates, in effect immediately prior to August 13, 1907, on the said classes, and that the through rates in effect from New Orleans to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville on traffic moving through Mobile to said destinations are unreasonable and unjust as applied to said classes to the extent that said through rates exceed the combination of locals from New Orleans to Mobile and from Mobile to said destinations, immediately prior to August 13, 1907, viz: Class 2, 2 cents; class 3, 13 cents; class 4, 13 cents; class 5, 12 cents; class 6, 1 cent; and class E, 5 cents; and also that the through rates from New Orleans to Montgomery, Selma, and Prattville on traffic moving through Pensacola and thence to said destinations are unjust and unreasonable to the extent that they exceed the amounts of the combination of locals from New Orleans to Pensacola and from Pensacola to said destinations, respectively, which were in effect immediately prior to August 13, 1907, viz: Class 3, 3 cents; class 4, 6 cents; class 5, 7 cents; and class 6, 1 cent; and having made and filed a report containing its findings of fact and conclusions thereon, which said report is made a part hereof.

It is ordered that the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., defendant in the above-named cases, be, and it is hereby, notified and required to cease and desist on or before the 1st day of February, 1910, and for a period of not less than two years thereafter, abstain from charging, demanding, collecting, or receiving for the transportation of traffic from New Orleans, La., to Mobile, Ala., rates and charges in excess of the following amounts: Class 2, 37 cents; class 3, 25 cents; class 4, 18 cents; class 5, 15 cents; class 6, 15 cents; class E, 15 cents; and from New Orleans, La., to Pensacola, Fla., rates and charges in excess of the following amounts: Class 3, 35 cents; class 4, 25 cents; class 5, 20 cents; class 6, 15 cents; and from New Orleans, La., via Mobile, to Montgomery and Selma, Ala., rates and charges in excess of the following amounts: Class 2, 77 cents; class 3, 55 cents; class 4, 42 cents; class 5, 35 cents; class 6, 35 cents; and class E, 39 cents; and from New Orleans, La., via Mobile, to Prattville, Ala., rates and charges in excess of the following amounts: Class 2, 87 cents; class 3, 63 cents; class 4, 50 cents; class 5, 43 cents; class 6, 43 cents; and class E, 44 cents; and from New Orleans, La., via Pensacola, to Montgomery and Selma, Ala., rates and charges in excess of the following amounts: Class 3, 65 cents; class 4, 49 cents; class 5, 40 cents; and class 6, 35 cents; and from New Orleans, La., via Pensacola, to Prattville, Ala., rates and charges in excess of the following amounts: Class 3, 73 cents; class 4, 57 cents; class 5, 48 cents; and class 6, 43 cents.

It is further ordered that these cases be retained for such further investigation and consideration of the commodity rates involved herein as the facts and circumstances may seem to require.

I, Edward A. Moseley, secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission, do hereby certify that the papers hereto attached and entitled report and order of the commission are true copies of the originals now on file in the office of this commission.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed the seal of the commission this 31st day of December, 1909.

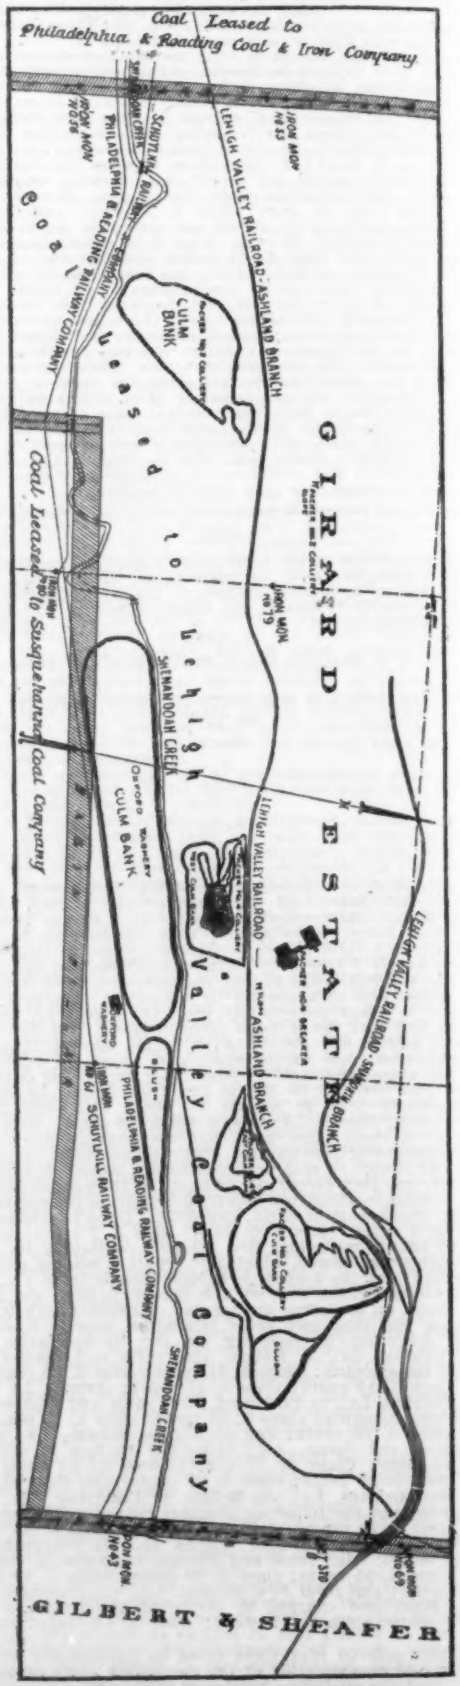
Mr. WORTHINGTON. I wish formally to offer in evidence the map showing the location of the Oxford and Packer dumps. It was identified by Mr. James Archbald when he was on the stand and a large edition of it is on the wall and has been referred to by several witnesses, but it is not in the record. It is marked "United States Senate Exhibit M."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? If not, it will be received.



[The accompanying diagram is the map referred to.]

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I wish, finally, to offer in evidence the plan of the Federal building in Scranton, which was identified by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury and marked as an exhibit at the time but was not offered in evidence.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I should like to ask the purpose of that testimony.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. The purpose of it is to have it in connection with the testimony of one or two witnesses. The map was shown to one of the witnesses; I have forgotten who the witness was; it was identified by Mr. Wenderoth, and afterwards referred to by one of the other witnesses. The purpose of it is to show that W. P. Boland could not from his office have seen the interior of Judge Archbald's office. He testified that he could see everybody coming in and going out of there, and saw Mr. Williams in there a good deal. The testimony in connection with the map, we think, shows that to be impossible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is admissible, if it has been sufficiently proven.

Mr. Manager STERLING. We do not object.

[For the plan referred to see page 1167.]

Mr. WORTHINGTON. We rest here, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there anything in rebuttal?

Mr. Manager STERLING. We will call Mr. Horgan.

TESTIMONY OF JOHN HORGAN, JR.

John Horgan, jr., being duly sworn, was examined and testified as follows:

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) Where do you live?—A. Scranton, Pa.

Q. What is your business?—A. Photographer.

Q. Did you recently take a picture of the Federal building in Scranton?—A. I did.

Q. Look at this exhibit, U. S. S. No. 101, and state if that is the picture you took?—A. (After examination.) It is.

Q. Where were you located when you took that picture?—A. In W. P. Boland's office in the Republican Building.

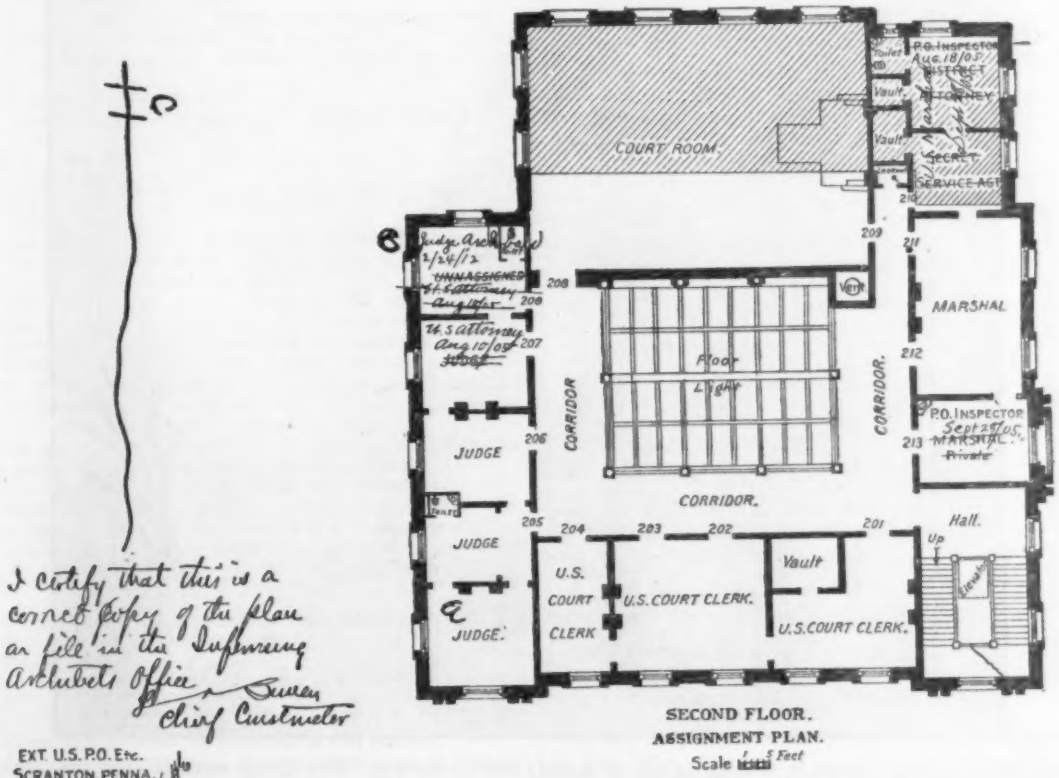
Q. And the picture is a picture of what building?—A. The Federal post office in Scranton.

Q. Mr. Boland occupied the same office when you took that picture that he has occupied for some years?—A. To my knowledge, yes.

Q. Looking at the picture, you see a man standing in the window in the Federal building, with a paper in his hand?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In whose office is that man?—A. I do not know.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I think the gentlemen will agree that it is Judge Archbald's office. [Continuing after consultation with counsel.] Mr. President, it is stipulated that the man standing in the window in the Federal building with a paper in his hand, as shown in the photograph, is in the window of one of the rooms of the offices occupied by Judge Archbald, known as——



Mr. WORTHINGTON. That is not just what we stated. What we stated is that that is the outer room——

Mr. Manager STERLING. It is known as the outer room of his suite of offices.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. One goes through it to get into the room where Judge Archbald habitually stayed.

Mr. Manager STERLING. That is where the witness said he saw Williams.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the manager offer that picture in evidence?

SECOND FLOOR.
ASSIGNMENT PLAN.
Scale 1/8 Inch Feet

NOTE: EXTENSION SHOWN BY SHADED PORTION.

Mr. Manager STERLING. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be admitted.

Mr. Manager STERLING. We do not consider it very material, but it rebuts the evidence that has just been offered on the other side.

[See page 1168 for photograph.]

Mr. Manager STERLING. That is all. Take the witness.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. There are no questions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The witness may retire.

CHRISTOPHER G. BOLAND—RECALLED.

Christopher G. Boland, having been previously sworn, was further examined and testified as follows:

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) Mr. Boland, when you went to Judge Archbald's office and found George M. Watson there with Archbald, I will ask you if Judge Archbald stated to you this, in substance: As I understand it, you employed Mr. Watson to settle these matters for you with the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. for $100,000, and you were to pay him a fee of $5,000 in case he made the settlement.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, I certainly object to that. This witness was here and the managers in their case in chief went fully into that conversation. It would be a great misadventure, it seems to me, to have him brought back now to go over the matter again. It was stated that he was summoned to that office by telephone; that he went over there and found Judge Archbald and Mr. Watson, and he went on to state what took place, and especially what took place in reference to the very matter now being asked about.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present witness?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. The present witness.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I submit that he did not testify as to the fact that is called for in this question, and I think it is perfectly competent in two views of the case. If we should say to the court that the matter was overlooked at the time, or if we should say to the court, which is the fact, that we have laid the foundation, when Judge Archbald was on the stand, to contradict him, because I asked him the exact question. It is perfectly competent in every view of the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear from counsel for the respondent.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. After testifying that he had been called to Judge Archbald's office and telling about the conversation with Watson the witness said:

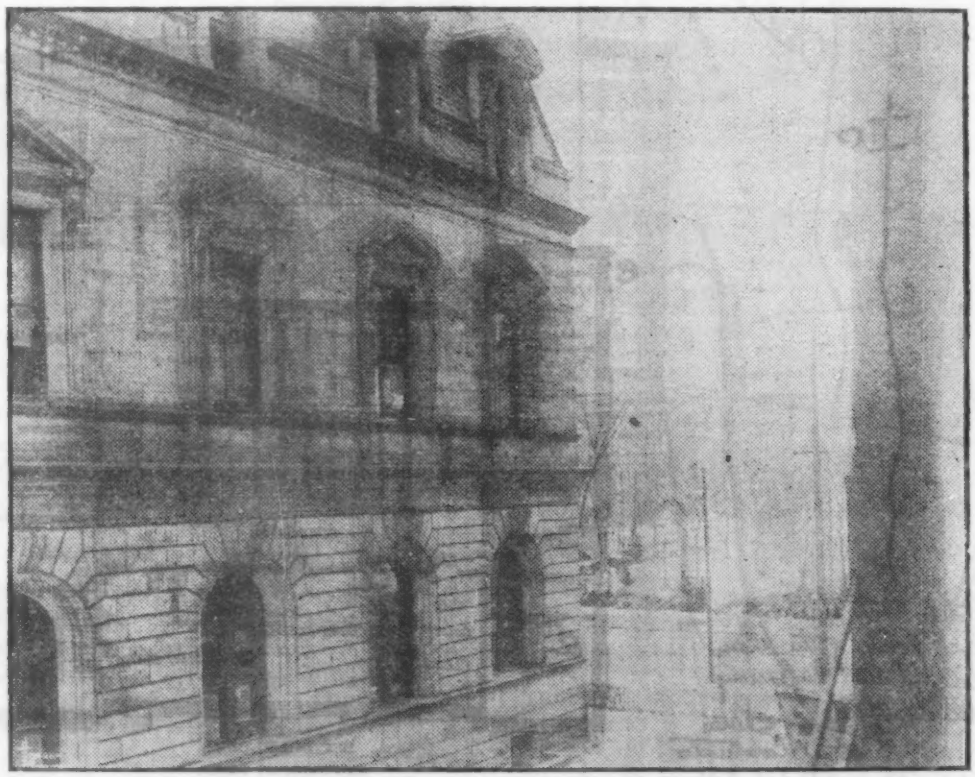
After talking with Mr. Watson he agreed to accept $5,000 for his fee, giving us $95,000 in the event of his selling the property. I remember a day or two after that, I think the day after that, being called over to Judge Archbald's office.

Q. Proceed.—A. Where I met Mr. Watson and Judge Archbald. After some discussion of the matter there, the judge informed me that he was going to assist Mr. Watson in an effort to dispose of the property and to release us from the difficulty in which we were involved at the time, referring particularly to this Peale case which was in his court—I think he was judge at that time—saying he would give it a good deal of consideration, and saying it was a good case to settle out of court.

Then, a little further down, on page 396, he was asked to state all that occurred. I am reminded that Judge Archbald denied that he ever had any conversation with Watson and this witness in his office—that they had ever been there together—so there can not be any foundation laid for anything he is said to have said at the conversation.

Mr. Manager STERLING. He said he did not remember any.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. This witness went on:



A. My recollection is that Mr. Watson recited the fact that he had spoken to the judge about the matter and that the judge had agreed to assist him. The judge stated to me that he would do what he could in the matter. But during the course of the talk a suggestion was made to me that there ought to be some paper furnished to Mr. Watson guaranteeing him, in the event of his disposing of the two-thirds interest or stock, that he would be paid this $5,000.

Q. Who made that suggestion to you?—A. I am not quite positive on that, but we all joined in the discussion—Judge Archbald, Mr. Watson, and myself. I informed both of them that, as my brother controlled a majority interest of the stock to be disposed of, I had consulted him and he had agreed that this payment should be made, but if they thought a paper ought to be made reciting the agreement I would endeavor to obtain it, and it was agreed that I should do so.

Further on in the volume, on page 397——

Mr. Manager STERLING. I do not see the purpose in reading this testimony.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. The purpose is to show that this witness was called on to state everything that occurred, and it is not competent to have him come back now to piece up what he then said.

Mr. Manager STERLING. There is nothing in the evidence of that kind. May I make my objection to what the counsel is reading? I am insisting that it is not proper for counsel to read the testimony of this witness. Even if we conceive that he was asked everything, and he said he had stated everything, we would have a perfect right to refresh the witness's recollection and ask what was said on a certain subject. That is the rule.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. It is a rule that is unknown to counsel for the respondent. They never heard of it before. It has been the rule that when you put a witness on the stand and go through a certain matter, you can not make him come back and go over that matter again unless something was brought out in the trial which substantially called for a denial.

Mr. Manager STERLING. That is just the point.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Judge Archbald said that no such conversation was held.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is any fact that enters into the testimony that was not developed on the former examination, the Chair thinks this investigation would justify its being brought to the attention of the Senate, even if it were not technically according to the ordinary practice. If it is simply a repetition, the Chair would hold it was not proper to further encumber the record. But if there is any fact within the knowledge of this witness that was not elicited on the former examination, the Chair would hold that the Senate is entitled to have it. The Chair will ask that the managers do not unnecessarily indulge in repetition of what has already been testified to.

Mr. Manager STERLING. We shall not go any further upon this particular question. Let the question be read by the reporter.

The Reporter read as follows:

Mr. Boland, when you went to Judge Archbald's office and found George M. Watson there with Archbald, I will ask you if Judge Archbald stated to you this in substance——

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I submit that the manager can only ask the witness if he recollects anything that he had not done before. He certainly has no right to bring him back and ask him the same question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that it is a leading question.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I will state that I put it in that form because I understand that is the form in which it must be put for the purpose of contradiction. As I said before, I have a perfect right to offer it as original testimony. I will put it in this form. [To the witness:] Mr. Boland, I will ask you if in that conversation which was had at the time referred to in the former question you remember of anything being said there about consideration?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I object. That is just what the manager can not do. I submit the witness ought to be asked if he recalls anything about that conversation that he did not tell us about when on the stand before.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I will do anything to accommodate the gentleman. [To the witness:] I will ask you, Mr. Boland, if there was anything in that conversation that you did not testify to the other day which you now recall?

The WITNESS. From your inquiry and hearing the judge testify that he had no recollection of my meeting with himself and George Watson at his office, I recall that the conversation or suggestion as to the amount to be paid to us and the fee to George Watson was substantially as you have embodied it in the question.

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) Just state what Judge Archbald said with reference to the amount of the proposition on which Watson was to settle. Give the substance of what the judge said about it.—A. In substance, it was reciting what Mr. Watson had told him, that he had been engaged by myself, on behalf of a majority of the stockholders of the Marian Coal Co., to dispose of their interest for $100,000, maximum, and that Mr. Watson was to receive a fee of $5,000, if he succeeded in making the sale, for disposing of our interest.

Mr. Manager STERLING. That is all.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to submit a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington propounds a question to the witness, which will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Have you talked this over with any of the managers before coming to the stand to-day?

The WITNESS. Yes, sir.

Cross-examination:

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I was about to ask Mr. Boland whether at that time——

The WITNESS. May I explain, if you please, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The witness has a right to explain his answer if he desires to do so.

The WITNESS. Before the court convened this afternoon Mr. Manager STERLING asked me as to my recollection of the matter to which I have just testified, and I told him that his question to me was substantially correct as it is now in the record.

Q. (By Mr. WORTHINGTON.) Why did you not tell about that when you were on the stand before?—A. I can not answer that exactly. I supposed I had covered the whole matter fully, or else I had overlooked the matter. I said I had met Mr. Watson and Judge Archbald in Judge Archbald's office.

Q. We know what you said. I will ask you whether when on the stand before this question was not asked you, on page 397, after you had told about what had occurred at that interview:

Q. Now I will ask you to state whether or not anything else was done or said by Judge Archbald at this interview which you have described, when Mr. Watson and yourself were present in Judge Archbald's office?

Do you remember that that question was asked?—A. If it is in the record it must have been asked.

Q. And your answer is—

A. I do not remember that. I do not know whether it was at that or a subsequent call at Judge Archbald's office the judge called on the telephone to the Scranton office of Mr. E. E. Loomis, who was the vice president of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co., to arrange an interview with him in reference to this matter.

I understand that at that time, if I recollect your testimony, it was stated either by Judge Archbald or by Mr. Watson, as you say, that the contract by which Mr. Watson was to be employed should be put in writing.—A. My understanding was that that was the purpose of my being called into Judge Archbald's office.

Q. In compliance with what took place at that office, you then went and got a letter from your brother William P. Boland.—A. That is substantially correct.

Q. I will call your attention to the language of that letter, which is on page 397 of the record, the same page I was reading from before. I will read it to you:

SCRANTON, PA., August 23, 1911.

C. G. BOLAND, Esq., Scranton, Pa.

DEAR SIR—

This being a letter from W. P. Boland, president of the Marian Coal Co., to you—

In reference to the matter of G. M. Watson being taken into the case of the Marian Coal Co. against the D. L. & W. would say, in confirmation of what I told you heretofore, that if through the efforts of Mr. Watson a satisfactory settlement is brought about the Marian Coal Co. agrees to pay him $5,000 for such settlement.

Now, if the contract that was arranged then was that you were to deliver it for $100,000 why did you not put it in the letter?—A. I did not draw that paper or acknowledgment.

Q. You went to W. P. Boland and told him what was demanded, did you not?—A. I did; and he then dictated to his stenographer, I think, that statement which he believed was sufficient to satisfy Mr. Watson that he would be paid $5,000 in the event of his disposing of the property. I presented it to Mr. Watson and he accepted it.

Q. I know about that.—A. I have already testified to that.

Q. I want to know if at that talk at Judge Archbald's office the arrangement was that Mr. Watson was to settle for the maximum sum of $100,000 and get $5,000 fee, if he did it, why it was put in here simply as a satisfactory settlement without saying anything about the amount.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I object. The witness has said that he did not prepare it.

Q. (By Mr. WORTHINGTON.) You went to your brother and told him what was demanded at that meeting?—A. I did.

Q. And what Watson required?—A. I did.

Q. And your brother, pursuant to what Williams told you, wrote this letter?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you gave it to Watson in compliance with Watson's demand?—A. Watson accepted it as satisfactory.

Q. That letter was dictated in your presence?—A. I believe so.

Q. And you were vice president of this company yourself?—A. I held no office in it at the time.

Q. You were director at that time in the Marian Coal Co.?—A. No; I held no office in the company. Some time in May, 1910, just before I went on a trip abroad, I resigned. I was president of the company previous to that, and a director, of course, but I resigned both the presidency and my position as director, being only a stockholder in the company.

Q. You were examined as a witness in this case by the Judiciary Committee?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have a talk with some of the managers before you went on the stand there as to your knowledge about these circumstances?—A. I do not remember having talked with anyone but Mr. Wrisley Brown in reference to it. He came to see me at Scranton and I made a statement. This I have already testified to.

Q. Mr. Wrisley Brown was sitting with the members of the Judiciary Committee in that inquiry, just as he is sitting here with the managers now, was he not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. He had taken your statement?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you not talk with the managers or somebody representing the managers before you were put on the stand at this trial in the Senate?—A. I have just stated that Mr. STERLING talked with me this afternoon.

Q. I am speaking about before you went on the stand in the first place in this trial, when you came down here to Washington?—A. Except in a general way; I was at their office in the House Office Building and met them, but there was no discussion as to my testimony or what I was to testify, that I can recall.

Q. Did you tell Mr. Wrisley Brown when he talked to you before you appeared before the Judiciary Committee that at this interview at Judge Archbald's office the sum of $100,000 had been mentioned as the maximum, and that Mr. Watson was to settle it?—A. I do not recall now whether I did or not.

Q. Did you ever tell anybody connected with this case?—A. Oh, yes.

Q. Before you were put on the stand at the present time?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. To whom did you tell anybody connected with this case?—A. Anyone connected with this case?

Q. Yes.—A. I testified to it already, I think, in the Senate proceedings, that I had agreed with Mr. Watson that he should obtain $5,000 in the event of his selling the property for $100,000.

Q. That is not what I am talking about. I am asking you whether you told anybody before you told it to Mr. Manager STERLING to-day or yesterday, whenever it was, that in Judge Archbald's office when he was present that was mentioned?—A. Did I tell it to anybody?

Q. Connected with this case? If you told it to Mr. Manager STERLING, when did you talk to Mr. Manager STERLING about it?—A. Just previous to the session opening this afternoon. He came into the Sergeant at Arms's office——

Q. Before that, at any time or place did you ever tell it to anybody connected with this case?—A. I certainly testified to it before the Judiciary Committee, and I am not sure but I testified to it here substantially—that is, my agreement with Watson—and it was clearly understood on this occasion when Watson and the judge and myself were together.

Q. I do not want you to go back again. I am asking you what you have testified to heretofore or with whom you have talked about this matter. You say you think you testified to it before the Judiciary Committee. Do you say that you testified before the Judiciary Committee that in Judge Archbald's presence in his office it was mentioned that Watson was to settle for a maximum of $100,000?—A. I do not recall that.

Q. No. Do you think you so testified when you were on the stand in this trial the other day?—A. I do not know; but I know that that is the fact.

Q. But you do not know that you ever mentioned that fact to anybody until you mentioned it to Mr. Manager STERLING to-day?—A. I am positive that I did, but I can not recall now, at this moment, to whom I mentioned it.

Re-direct examination:

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) Just one question, Mr. Boland: You just told your brother William P. Boland that you had been——

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I object to that leading style of question, Mr. President.

Mr. Manager STERLING. This is cross-examination of what the other side drew out.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Cross-examination!

Mr. Manager STERLING. Yes.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I am learning a great deal, Mr. President, about cross-examination, if this is cross-examination. The witness has been called by the managers.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. There is a good deal for you to learn, perhaps.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the manager can ask the witness what he said.

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) You did go to your brother and tell him what Judge Archbald and Watson had said about the fees, did you?—A. I did.

Q. And that they wanted it in writing?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. They did not demand that anything be put in writing about the price they were to settle for, did they?—A. No; and I can recall now that Mr. Watson was not bound strictly to obtain $100,000 for us. He was told very distinctly that we would be willing to talk about a lesser amount.

Q. And did they tell you, either of them, that you should put in the writing relating to the attorneys' fees that the settlement should be for $100,000?—A. No; all that I was required to do was to obtain from my brother, who was president of the company and held, either personally or by option, two-thirds of the stock of the Marian Coal Co., an acknowledgment for Mr. Watson guaranteeing him a $5,000 fee in the event of his succeeding in selling the property.

Q. That is all they demanded, then, and all you asked your brother to give them?—A. When I say "the sale of the property" I mean the stock of the company held by the majority of the stockholders.

Q. And the very fact that you had said to Mr. Watson that you would take less——

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Now, Mr. President, I certainly do object. The manager is not only leading, but is putting arguments in the mouth of the witness.

Mr. Manager STERLING. It is nothing but cross-examination about what you have brought out.

Mr. SIMPSON. Cross-examination of your own witness?

Mr. Manager STERLING. Certainly. Our own witness on a matter you brought out.

Mr. SIMPSON. I never heard that you could cross-examine your own witness until to-day. I object, sir.

Mr. Manager STERLING. If you have never heard of it before, you have heard of it now. On any new matter that is brought out on cross-examination the party calling the witness may cross-examine. We never asked the witness about this writing, and we have got a perfect right to cross-examine him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The manager can examine without asking leading questions, the Chair is sure.

Mr. Manager STERLING. It is pretty hard to ask this question without leading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course, the subject matter about which information is desired must necessarily be suggested.

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) Inasmuch as you had authorized Mr. Watson or said to Mr. Watson that you would take less than $100,000, do you think that it would have been proper to have put in this agreement the limitation of $100,000?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I object to that, Mr. President. It is calling for an opinion of this witness on a matter on which he is not an expert.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the manager can ask what, in his opinion, was required to be put in the agreement in pursuance of the conference which he had already had. That is legitimate.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I will not press it further.

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) Mr. Boland, in your testimony before the Committee on the Judiciary, I will ask you if Mr. LITTLETON asked you these questions, which are found on page 992:

Mr. LITTLETON. I said Mr. Watson recited to you and to Judge Archbald, or in your presence, what had been agreed to?
Mr. BOLAND. At the judge's office?
Mr. LITTLETON. Yes.
Mr. BOLAND. Yes, sir.
Mr. LITTLETON. And you say the judge "assented"; that was the word you used. Just what was it to which the judge assented?
Mr. BOLAND. The judge assented to assisting Mr. Watson.
Mr. LITTLETON. In the sale of the property?
Mr. BOLAND. In the sale of the property.
Mr. LITTLETON. The price was named at that time?
Mr. BOLAND. The price was named; yes, sir
Mr. LITTLETON. At $100,000?
Mr. BOLAND. Yes, sir.

Were those questions asked you and did you make those answers before the Judiciary Committee?—A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I will say, Mr. President, that I thought until last night that that testimony was in the examination of Mr. Boland before the Senate. When I ascertained that it was not, I talked with Mr. Boland this morning, and inquired about it, and he told me just what he has testified here to-day. The testimony of Mr. Boland before the Judiciary Committee, from which I read, is found on page 992 of the evidence taken before the committee.

Recross-examination:

Q. (By Mr. WORTHINGTON.) Now, Mr. Boland, I will ask you whether you testified to this before the Judiciary Committee, reading from the middle of page 993:

Mr. BOLAND. The matter is quite well fixed on my memory that the judge informed me that he was to assist Mr. Watson in the disposal of our interest; but as to any details, how it should be done, or anything further than that, I do not think it was discussed, outside of the judge's suggestion about a case then pending, the Peale case.
Mr. LITTLETON. Just before we get to that, did you know at that time that there was any price in contemplation for the sale of this property beyond $100,000?
Mr. BOLAND. Not at that time; no, sir.
Mr. LITTLETON. Was anything said about fixing a larger or higher price than $100,000 in that conference?
Mr. BOLAND. I do not think it was said at that time.
Mr. LITTLETON. Was Watson's $5,000 to come out of the $100,000?
Mr. BOLAND. Yes, sir.

A. That is correct; I so testified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there any further questions for the witness?

Mr. Manager STERLING. That is all.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I have nothing more to ask.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The witness may retire. Is it desired that the witness shall be retained any further?

Mr. Manager WEBB. No, sir; the witness may be excused.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The witness is finally discharged.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, the managers rest here.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Judge Archbald, will you take the stand?

TESTIMONY OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD—RECALLED.

Q. (By Mr. WORTHINGTON.) Judge Archbald, you have heard Mr. C. G. Boland just testify about a statement in your office that Watson was to settle for a maximum price of $100,000. Will you tell us what you have to say about that?

Mr. Manager STERLING. We object to pursuing this any further. Both of these witnesses have testified on that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair certainly thinks that counsel have a right to ask the question of the witness. The witness will proceed to answer it.

Mr. WORTHINGTON (to the witness). What have you to say about that?

The WITNESS. May I hear the question again?

Q. (By Mr. WORTHINGTON.) You have just heard the witness, C. G. Boland, state that at your office, when Mr. Watson and he and yourself were present, it was stated that Watson was to get $5,000 for effecting a settlement of these matters for $100,000 or less—not to exceed $100,000. Will you tell us whether anything of that kind took place?—A. Not that I remember.

Q. Will you tell us whether at any time or at any place you were informed that there was a limitation of $100,000 on the price that he was to settle for?—A. On the contrary, I understood that the claim of the Bolands which Mr. Watson was to present was for one hundred and sixty-odd thousand dollars.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I object. We have been over all that.

Mr. WORTHINGTON (to the witness). You can answer the question whether at any time or at any place you were told that there was a maximum limit of $100,000 that was put upon Watson as to the amount he was to demand in settlement of the claims of the Marian Coal Co.—A. Never.

Q. Now, in reference to the photograph, which has just been put in evidence, of the Federal building, there is in one of the windows of the building a man standing holding a piece of paper. Have you seen that?—A. (After examining.) Yes; I see that.

Q. Will you tell what you have to say as to that room?—A. That is not my office; that is an outer office occupied by my messenger or crier. My office is the one in the extreme corner.

Q. To the right or left of the one in which the man is standing in the photograph?—A. To the right in this picture.

Q. During what period was it that your office was where you have just mentioned?—A. My office was where I have mentioned from the time I moved into the Federal building, along some time in the spring of—well, soon after I was appointed. There were changes made that——

Q. Soon after you were appointed to what office?—A. To the district court.

Q. That was in 1901?—A. That was along in 1901; but I did not go in there immediately; then from that time until the office was changed to the rear of the building, and that office was occupied by Judge Witmer. That occurred along about February or March of 1912.

Q. So that from February or March of last year your office has been directly opposite Mr. Boland's office?—A. Yes; since along in March or April. The office I am occupying at present in Scranton is directly opposite the office occupied by Mr. Boland in the Republican Building.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. That is all.

Recross-examination:

Q. (By Mr. Manager STERLING.) Judge, one entering your office must go through this room, as I understand, to get to your office?—A. Yes; people to enter the office that I occupy go through that room.

Q. But it belongs to the same suite that your office does?—A. Yes.

Mr. Manager STERLING. That is all.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. That is all. We rest again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there anything further on the part of the managers?

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, that concludes the case for the managers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The evidence is therefore concluded.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Now, Mr. President, I should like to have the Chair announce that the witnesses may be discharged.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All the witnesses summoned on either side are finally discharged.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. May I ask, Mr. President, whether the Senate has adopted any rule in reference to the argument of this case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There has been no action taken by the Senate. The Chair will call attention to the fact——

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I ask that Rule XXI be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With the permission of the Senator who asks for the reading of the rule, the Chair will call attention to the fact that the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSTON], who was sworn in this morning as a Senator, has not been sworn in for the purposes of this trial. The Chair is not informed as to whether it is the desire of the Senator to be now sworn in.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, my colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] is not now in the Senate. I believe it is his desire, inasmuch as he has been unable to hear the testimony in the case, not to be sworn in as a Member of the Senate sitting in the impeachment proceedings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thought it was proper that he should call attention to the fact. That direction will be given, unless there is some other suggestion made in regard to it. The rule suggested by the Senator from New York will be read.

The Secretary read Rule XXI from the "Rules of Procedure and Practice in the Senate when Sitting on the trial of impeachments," as follows:

XXI. The case, on each side, shall be opened by one person. The final argument on the merits may be made by two persons on each side (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate, upon application for that purpose), and the argument shall be opened and closed on the part of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I will say, Mr. President, so far as we are concerned, we are satisfied to proceed under that rule.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, I have conferred with my associate, and, if my recollection is correct, I believe that that rule has not been adhered to. I know, as the present occupant of the chair will bear witness, that the rule was relaxed in the last case of this kind before the Senate. It is my recollection also, Mr. President, that it has not been enforced in other cases. I believe that in the Belknap case three managers were allowed to participate in the final argument. Of course, this is a matter that addresses itself to the sound discretion of the Senate.

Mr. President, I desire to say, on behalf of the managers, that they are of the opinion they occupy a position before the Senate in this case somewhat different from that of employed counsel. The Chair is doubtless familiar with that view, it having been heretofore taken by managers in the discussion of questions similar to this and other questions in the trial of impeachment cases.

The managers come here not voluntarily nor for any reward, however honorable it may be to engage in the practice of the noble profession of the law for the honorarium. We have come here, Mr. President, in pursuance of one of the most solemn, and I may say disagreeable, duties that falls to the lot of a Representative. We come imbued with that sense of duty, and we believe that we owe it to the correct exposition of this case before the Senate in the final argument that that rule be not enforced.

It will readily occur to the Senate that there has been one speech already made in behalf of the respondent. The respondent himself has occupied, I believe, on yesterday, something like four hours in presenting his side of this case to the Senate. To-day he has also occupied, I believe, as much as two hours, or three perhaps, as my associate suggests, in putting his side of his controversy before the Senate.

Mr. President, this case is different, of course, from all other cases. The issues of law and fact in this case, I think, are in many essential features different from any other impeachment case that has heretofore engaged the attention of the Senate. The counsel for the respondent said that there was more than one case; that all these different articles involved different cases. In some sort that is true. It involves the necessity of a full and comprehensive review of the law of impeachment; it involves the full and comprehensive review and analysis of the testimony as applicable to the law which the Senate will find to obtain in this case.

Therefore, Mr. President, we think that in view of the fact that counsel for the respondent will be accorded as much time in the presentation of their defense as will be accorded to the managers, of course it is but trite to say that that is right. In view of the fact that the managers are of opinion that this rule should be relaxed, and in view of the other facts that I have suggested to the Senate, the managers on the part of the House would prefer that they be accorded the privilege which heretofore has been accorded managers, to divide the time which may be allotted to them amongst them as they may see fit to distribute it.

There is nothing unusual in this request, and I think the circumstances of the case warrant the managers in asking of the Senate the relaxation of that rule to the extent of whatever time may be accorded to us and that it may be divided as we see fit.

Further, Mr. President, while I am on my feet I desire to say that the suggestion has been made as to the limitation of time. A limitation of time, Mr. President, was never imposed upon the managers except in one case, so far as I now recollect, and that was in the case of Swayne. The Chair will remember that that impeachment trial was brought to a conclusion at almost the very close of the short session of the Congress; it was terminated in the latter part of the month of February according to my recollection. The Congress itself expired immediately on the 4th of March thereafter. There is, I am informed, Mr. President, not such a condition existing now. Of course we know that this is not yet quite the middle of January, and I am informed that the business of the Senate is not so urgent at this time but that a reasonable latitude may be given for the discussion of this case. In fact, Mr. President, I have been told that the Senate is waiting for appropriation bills to come from the House. I do not know but that there may be other matters that some individual Senators may want to urge upon the attention of the Senate; but certainly it is true that neither in the point of limitation as to the time of the remainder of the session nor in the attitude of the public business before the Senate is it necessary to enforce a time limitation, as was done in the Swayne case.

Therefore I submit what I have said as the views of the managers in respect to these two propositions, and I may assure the Senate, if such assurance be necessary, and standing in my responsible place, and with a public duty imposed upon me by the popular branch of our National Legislature, that the managers will not abuse whatever indulgence or whatever latitude the Senate may allow. We will not abuse the patience of the Senate. The managers will conduct such an argument as they feel in duty bound to make to discharge an unsought-for and painful public duty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I move that the doors of the Senate be closed for deliberation.

The motion was agreed to. The managers on the part of the House, the respondent, and his counsel withdrew. The galleries having been cleared, the Senate proceeded to deliberate with closed doors. After 40 minutes the doors were reopened.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 8, 1913, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 7, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Incline Thine ear, O God our Father, and hear our petition. Deliver us, we pray Thee, from the consuming fire of selfishness, the root of all evil, since it checks the growth of the soul, blights the love of the home, corrodes society, and despoils the State or Nation, that we may go about our Father's business in the spirit of altruism illustrated in the Sermon on the Mount and fulfilled in the incomparable life and character of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SPEECH OF PRESIDENT TAFT.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech delivered by the President of the United States in New York City last Saturday evening, January 4, 1913, at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech delivered by the President of the United States last Saturday evening in New York City. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The speech is as follows:

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Toastmaster, and my fellow Republicans: In so far as this banquet savors of personal compliment to me and takes on the aspect of my funeral obsequies after the late defeat, I accept the honor with pleasure, and take part in the proceedings with the interest and enthusiasm of one most deeply concerned. It is not usual for the deceased to give very full expression to his feelings at the wake, but I remember that in one of Boucicault's Irish dramas the corpse was sufficiently revived to partake of the liquid refreshment and became the chief participant in the festivities. A few opening remarks directed to the character of the deceased and the manner of his taking off may not, therefore, be inappropriate.

Mr. Bryan said in the course of the campaign that I had been elected to the Presidency by a large majority and would be relegated to private life by a unanimous vote. When I read what he said I thought he was as poetic and as unreliable in his prophecies as usual; but, in truth, nothing but Vermont and Utah prevented a literal fulfillment of his forecast, and he was nearer than ever before in his life to a fact.

I think I have separated myself sufficiently from the humiliation of defeat to be able to look upon the history of my administration with calmness and clearness of vision, affected only by the fact that I was one of the principal actors, and naturally inclined to give the best color to everything which I did or attempted to do. I entered office under certain obligations laid down in a national platform, and I attempted as well as I could to carry them out as I understood them. They could only be carried out by legislation to be enacted by the two Houses of Congress, and therefore it became essential for me to associate myself as intimately as possible with the leaders of both Houses and the majority that controlled each. The leaders of both Houses were Republicans, orthodox, old-time Republicans, men who, justly or unjustly, were called reactionaries, and I secured from them an earnest cooperation that led to the enactment of a number of valuable statutes. In doing so, however, I was brought into opposition to a faction of the Republican Party that had become insurgent and declined to follow the leadership of the dominant majority.

As this faction had supported me for the nomination and some of the older leaders had opposed me, it was charged I had in some way betrayed the insurgents, had forfeited the right to their support, and had surrendered to the regular Republican organization, and had myself become a reactionary. It is difficult for me now, as I look back, to see how I could have pursued a different course, for except in this way I could not have secured the legislation which had been promised.

PAYNE TARIFF WAS REVISION DOWNWARD.

The new tariff law was bitterly criticized, but it was, nevertheless, a revision downward. It has been one of the most useful laws possible in its many provisions, creating a Court of Customs Appeals, giving us an opportunity for a new tariff commission, giving us free trade with the Philippines, providing a maximum and minimum clause, and imposing the best form of income tax—the corporation tax. But for its enactment the deficit of $58,000,000 which stared me in the face when I came into office would have been repeated and increased each succeeding year, and we would have had to resort to bond issues to meet the ordinary running expenses of the Government. Then, by the same agency of the regular Republican majorities, we passed a law which for the first time gave to the Interstate Commerce Commission adequate control of the railroads.

We created a Commerce Court, which, in the interest of the dispatch of business, reduced the time of the remedy of shippers against offending railroad companies from two years to six months. We established the postal savings bank, which has greatly inured to the thrift of that part of the Nation which needs to be taught thrift and requires the incentive of a Government guaranty.

We passed the conservation bill, which enabled us to withdraw all the lands that needed further legislation for their proper disposition in the interest of preserving the national resources for public use. We passed the "white-slave" act, the interstate-commerce employers' liability act, the Mining Bureau bill, and the Children's Bureau bill. We passed the reciprocity agreement with Canada, which produced free trade in natural products between Canada and this country, and which, while it would not have greatly affected farm product prices, would have steadied them and greatly increased business between ourselves and Canada.

On the Executive side, we made treaties of universal arbitration with England and France. We pushed the trust prosecutions as they had never been pushed before, and we have thus in a quiet way prepared a solution of the trust question. We organized an Economy and Efficiency Commission, which has been engaged in pointing out possible consolidations, the correlation of the business of the bureaus, and the introduction of efficient means of business, resulting in an annual saving of many millions; secured, through the action of the Supreme Court, great expedition in equity procedure, and we have recommended to Congress the conferring of the same authority on the court in reference to the proceedings at common law. We have enforced restrictions against rebates and the general fraudulent use of the mails with a rigor and success that has never before been equaled in the history of the Department of Justice. We have kept down the expenses of the Government, so that instead of increasing annually, as they had in recent years, at the rate of $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 a year, they have been reduced from year to year until within a few months, when the new basis of pension allotments increased the appropriations.

FROM PANIC SHADOW TO REAL PROSPERITY.

There has been no scandal connected with the administration. By our intervention in South and Central America we have contributed to the peace of the world in ending revolutions and preventing wars, and we have carried the work of the Panama Canal construction to a point so near completion that the first vessel may proceed on the bosom of the broad ship canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific in October of this year, on the four hundredth anniversary of the day Balboa discovered the Pacific.

Finally, although we entered office in the shadow of a recent panic, during the four years of this administration business has revived, confidence has returned, widespread prosperity is at hand, the demand for labor is greater than ever, and the standard of wages for all classes of labor is higher than ever before in our history.

Now, under these conditions, what was it that impeded my progress as a candidate, and what was the political disease of which I died? I am hopeful that when historians conduct their post-mortems it may be found that my demise was due to circumstances over which I had no great control, and to a political cataclysm which I could hardly have anticipated or avoided; but, whether this be true or not, even friendly critics are able to point out personal reasons why it was that, though I went in, I also went out, with large majorities.

It has been charged against me that I am an aristocrat, and that I have no sympathy with the common people, and I have no doubt that this impression has gone abroad and has settled deep in the minds of many people. Now, I do not think it is true. I think I am as sympathetic with the common people, as earnestly desirous of their happiness, as anxious to see that they have justice accorded them, and that they enjoy their rights under the law and Constitution as fully and completely as any one. I believe most profoundly that popular government is the best government that we can have, and I am greatly concerned that it shall continue and be successful in giving to the people at large the best measure of individual liberty on the one hand and the greatest practical efficiency in government on the other. It may be that in my earnest desire to make government efficient I have not always explained that I believe that to make government efficient is to work directly in the interest of the common people.

My administration has come and gone in a period of unrest and agitation for something intangible which it is difficult definitely to describe. We have lived during the last four years, and are living now, in an atmosphere of strenuous denunciations of certain evils and loud aspirations for an ideal state in which the common people are to become happier, the poor and the oppressed are to acquire property and cease suffering, and much or all of the change is to be accomplished through the agency of the Government.

The accumulations of swollen fortunes during the two decades preceding, and many of them by an improper means—that is, by a violation of the antitrust law or the antirebate law—aroused a feeling of just indignation and set the tune to public addresses. The notes of denunciation of the malefactors of wealth on the one hand and of promises of rectifying such inequalities by governmental means and increasing the equality of opportunity among the poor rang pleasantly in the ears of the people. They made for the popularity of those who produced the sweet tones, assuring better conditions and a complete social reform, all by means of elections and governmental action.

MANY SOCIAL WORKERS MISLED BY ENTHUSIASM.

Then, too, in the material improvement, in the larger amount of wealth devoted now to education and philanthropy, there has been aroused a most commendable interest in the poor and the suffering. By university settlements and by other means the observation of many well-to-do people is focused on the poor and suffering and the supposed causes which produce poverty, and so intensely enthusiastic do social workers become that they lose their sense of proportion as to the relative number of the poor whom they are laboring for and forget altogether the interest of those who are not dependents and yet who make up a great majority of the common people.

The public has not been content to estimate and weigh the things done at their face value, but has accepted the hostile statements that the good things which were done were done either with an improper motive or because I could not help it, or were really done by somebody else, and that, on the whole, I was unfriendly to the people, a reactionary in spirit, opposed to all reforms leading to the amelioration of the inequalities and sufferings of the oppressed and poor in society.

TIME MAY ENLIGHTEN PUBLIC TO REAL FACTS.

I am not complaining of this situation. I am hopeful that as time rolls by the facts may disclose themselves and may lead people to believe that more real reform has been accomplished in my administration than will ever flow from an attempt to put into practical operation the promises which have been made to the people in recent party platforms and on the stump of a regeneration of society through the instrumentality of government, the making of the rich moderately poor and of the poor moderately rich, and an elimination by statute of all sin, injustice, poverty, and suffering from our country and community.

Time usually brings about an opportunity for retaliation, but if you are a strong man, of good sense, you feel it beneath you when the opportunity comes to exercise it. This personal feeling against me on the part of a number of Senators and Representatives and other members of the party doubtless operates with them as a substantial cause for continued dissension. It gratifies me to feel that my going out of office and public life will remove this cause, will end the "Taftphobia" that has governed the action of some in influential positions, and will tend to end these divisions that have been caused by personal reasons rather than on principle.

REPUBLICAN PARTY IS STILL A FORCE FOR GOOD.

But I have consumed too much time in discussing my personal relations to the late campaign. The chief purpose of this banquet was not to honor me or to soothe my injured pride. It was to show to the country that the Republican Party is still a force in this country for good, and that it is the duty of those who believe this to give a reason for the faith that is in them.

We were beaten in the last election. We ran third in the race. Why is it that we gather here with so much spirit and with so little of the disappointment and humiliation supposed to accompany political disaster? Is it not that in spite of the defeat recorded at the election in November we were still victorious in saving our country from an administration whose policy involved the sapping of the foundations of the democratic, constitutional, representative government, whose appeals to the people were calculated to arouse class hatred that has heretofore been the ruin of popular government, and whose contempt for the limitations of constitutional law and the guaranties of civil liberty promised chaos and anarchy in a country that has until this time been the model of individual freedom and effective popular government?

The result of the Chicago convention was a triumph for the permanence of Republican institutions, the importance of which can not be exaggerated, and I wish to emphasize this, in order that it may be known that we meet in no spirit of despair, but rather to rejoice in a victory for law and order and the institution handed down to us by our fathers.

It is true that we were defeated at the polls by our old-time opponent, the Democratic Party. It is true that they are now going to work out again the problem of eating your cake and having it, too, by showing how it is possible to change from a system of protection for manufactured industries to one of a tariff for revenue only without affecting the industries to their detriment and without halting production or lowering wages. It is true that we are to witness an attempt to satisfy the crying need for a new banking and currency system by a plan which is to embody as many as possible of the features of the Aldrich Monetary Commission plan, disguised as much as may be so as to permit denial of any resemblance. It is true that we are to witness a change of officeholders from Republicans to Democrats, and we are to see how economical the new administration is to be, as compared with the old.

We have been through this before. It may be that this time they can do what they have not succeeded in doing heretofore, and if so, and they can maintain the prosperity of the country at its present record level, then we can be Americans before we are Republicans and rejoice at their success. If they can vindicate their claim that they will reduce the cost of living to a moderate point by reducing the tariff, then they will be entitled to point to this as an achievement fulfilling their promise and vindicating their policy.

If this was all there was to the situation I doubt if we would have this dinner—I doubt if we would be here in such great numbers—because this recurrence of the traditional action and reaction between the two old parties in respect to economic policies is not one so exceptional as to call for noteworthy celebration.

VOTED FOR WILSON TO DEFEAT COL. ROOSEVELT.

The fact that brings us here is that in the late election there were 3,500,000 voters—an irreducible minimum of the Republican Party—who were determined to remain a force in the community, to prevent any constitutional amendment and legislation of a revolutionary program announced by the so-called Progressive Party. Added to that 3,500,000 we may perhaps count another 1,000,000 electors who will stand by us with even more fervor, because they were Republicans sympathizing with the Republican candidate and platform but voted for Mr. Wilson to avert the danger of Mr. Roosevelt's election. The importance of retaining these 4,500,000 voters as a concrete force for the sustaining of our democratic, representative, constitutional government is the chief purpose which calls us here.

It has already been pointed out that there is a spirit of unrest among the people, and that this spirit is what has brought about the division of the Republican Party into the present Republican Party and the Progressive Party.

We are told that the spirit of unrest demands progressive measures that shall bring the people more directly into the operation of their own Government; that shall emancipate the poor from the burden of poverty; that shall introduce social justice, relieve oppression, banish dishonest methods from business, and establish a society founded on altruism and the highest Christian principles of morality. We enthusiastically approve and adopt all these ideals of society, in which every member is to be prompted by love and charity for his fellow men; in which there is to be no suffering or poverty, because they are to be relieved through the just and generous conduct of those who have toward those who have not.

But what we contend is that in the progress toward such higher ideals, toward a society governed by purer ethics than those which have obtained, we shall not throw away the limitations of law and the principles of government, which have been attained after thousands of years of struggle, which constitute an assurance to each individual in the community against all invasion by other people, whether many or few, of his life, his liberty, his right of property, his right of freedom of religion, his right of free labor, his right of free contract, and his right to pursue happiness in his own way, subject only to the limitations that he yield the same right to others.

DANGER IN UNRESTRICTED RULE OF THE MAJORITY.

What is there in present conditions that the Progressive Party presents which can lead us to suppose that human nature has so changed that no restraint is necessary in all society to prevent one man from oppressing another, or to prevent a majority of us from oppressing an individual or a minority? What is it that constitutional limitations are for in popular government? A popular government is a government by the people—that is, by a majority of the people—who under the law are given the right to exercise the electoral franchise; and constitutional limitations are imposed to prevent the misuse of the power of the majority, so that the individual or the minority may not suffer injustice through the action of the majority.

Where is the security in the present society that the majority may not from time to time do injustice to the minority and to the individual?

It is said that we mistrust the people if we assume that the majority will ever do an injustice. In other words, the contention is that the vote of the majority is always right. Well, as the majority in passing upon a given question determines sometimes one way and sometimes another, in which case is it right?

If the wisdom of our fathers and of the long line of able men who have fought for popular government has led to the introduction into every scheme of government of restraints to prevent injustice by the majority to the minority or an individual, what is there that has happened in recent years to make us feel that a change has come over the character of majorities, so that they may not exercise the tyranny that they have exercised in the past, and in respect of which they have been restrained by constitutional limitation? How are the inequalities of society to be wiped out? How is government to insure happiness to the individual? Is it by equal distribution of property? Is it by taking from one man that which is his and giving it to another who has not earned it? I submit that this is the ultimate result of a thorough analysis of all the theories advanced by the Progressive Party.

PROGRESSIVE APPEALS MADE TO DISCONTENTED.

As one profound political economist said, such schemes usually can be reduced to a combination by A and B to take from C that which is his and confer it on D. A and B do not combine and confer on D what A and B can, but only what C owns. When A and B are anxious to divide what they have and give it to D instead of dividing what C has and giving it to D, we shall reach an era in human history when some of the theories advanced by the Progressives will work in practice. Meantime we must proceed on the theory that A and B are still moved by a desire to keep to themselves what is theirs, and to have the advantage and happiness that may proceed from the ownership of the property they have acquired.

Is there anything in the appeals which are made by the orators for the Progressive Party that leads one to think that they regard their audience moved by a self-sacrificing spirit to give up what they have to be distributed to others less fortunate? On the contrary, are not all the appeals which are made based on the theory that the people addressed will be moved to adopt the reforms advocated by which they themselves will be improved in circumstance and somebody else will lose what is his?

It was urged in favor of the reciprocity agreement that it would reduce the cost of living by having free trade in natural products between Canada and the United States. I did not subscribe to that argument, because I did not believe that it would do other than make a larger reservoir, and thus steady prices and prevent a further increase in the cost of living. But the argument advanced by our Progressive brothers against the Republican candidate with the farmers was that he had favored reciprocity with the idea of reducing the prices at which the farmers sold their products. Did farmers rush forward to support that candidate because of the benefit which it was said would be conferred upon their less fortunate fellow men? Was not every argument advanced in the last campaign to induce the votes of those who heard the argument on the ground that those who heard would be better circumstanced financially if they adopted the theory which was being presented?

In other words, did not the whole campaign illustrate in this respect the very opposite condition from that of a society in which men are moved in their votes and governmental action by altruistic and not by selfish motives? And is not the whole program of the Progressive Party a program which in its ultimate result intends the taking from the successful and conferring on the unsuccessful that which the successful have earned?

If all that it means is that those who have made their money unlawfully or improperly shall be called upon to disgorge it, no one would object to the proposition, however difficult it might be to work out the theory, but when it is considered that such theories can be satisfied only by taking all the property there is and putting it in a common pot and distributing it about without regard to the prudential virtues we are able to see the destruction that will come to modern progress by putting any such theories into effect.

The great and tremendous advantage of the right of property is that it furnishes a motive for man to exercise industry and self-restraint, and the more he improves the general prosperity of the community in which he lives and so the more he helps his fellows. He gives them an opportunity to labor and to save and thus to increase the general accumulation of capital, its general use and its general product, and with the increase in the general product the opportunity for better material living grows, and with the opportunity for better material living the opportunity for better spiritual living comes. The moment that by destroying the right of property you take away the motive for accumulation, the motive for acquisition, the motive for industry and self-restraint, you take away the impulse which has made the world what it is. That is what the history of civilization has shown. No other theory has worked out and has demonstrated its usefulness.

POOR ARE GETTING POORER WHILE RICHES GROW.

We have gone on improving the material and spiritual welfare. The per capita of wealth in this country has increased most largely, the poor are not getting poorer, though the rich may be getting richer, but there has been a general improvement all along the line. We have been developing in individuals greater interest in their fellow men.

We have been cultivating the charitable impulses, forming associations for the intelligent application of charity, associations for the relief of the distressed, and all these movements should receive the highest encouragement from every lover of his kind, but to assume from these movements that business and governmental reforms can be based on a theory that the majority of men will be governed by altruistic and not by selfish consideration, with a view to supporting themselves and their families, and to increasing their possessions, is to fly in the face of the commonest and most clearly accepted fact.

We have been very prosperous in this country, and very happy, and really very free from oppression, in the sense of the deprivation of our liberty or of our property, and so clear and easy has the assumption and retention of our constitutional rights been that we have failed to realize the struggles that were essential in the past to establish those rights and secure them beyond violation.

In other words, we have had so little occasion to assert in formal suit the constitutional limitations to preserve to us that which our forefathers intended to secure by the Constitution that we do not realize that all our rights are dependent on that very instrument, and that the minute you repeal or modify it that minute you become subject to the danger of a tyranny either of an individual or a majority.

These rights, secured by constitutional limitation, when challenged or violated, are to be vindicated through the courts, but under the system which our Progressive friends propose, the limitations themselves are to be subjected to the abolishing power of a referendum; and when they are embodied and enforced in a judgment of a court they may still be lost by a referendum of the judgment to the populace in an election to determine whether the court's decision is right.

Thus it is easily seen that under the Progressive program the whole machinery that has been so carefully built up by the older statesmen of this country and of England to save to the individual and to the minority freedom, equality before the law, the right of property, and the right to pursue happiness is to be taken apart and thrown into a junk heap, and the preservation of such rights or privileges, if you choose to call them such, is to be left to the charitable impulses of a benevolent administrator.

No one at all familiar with the principles of free government and the tendency of erring and power-loving human nature would be content to have his liberty or his right of property or his right to pursue happiness dependent upon the benevolence of anyone.

The Republican Party stands for protection to the Nation's industries, for the retention of the Philippines and the enlightenment of the Filipinos, for widespread education, for those election laws which give the people the best opportunity to express their preference, for all really practical measures which look through the aid of the Government to the relief of the oppressed, but above all it stands for the preservation of the pillars of popular government; it stands for the maintenance of the rights of all, for the greatest good to the greatest number, and it believes that those ends are attainable through the control of the majority properly limited by fundamental law.

OPPOSES ANY SACRIFICE OF PARTY PRINCIPLES.

Now, it has been suggested that the Republican Party can unite again with many of the Progressive Party if only a different rule can be put into force through the convention or the national committee by which the reduction of southern representation could be secured and a fairer method of selecting the candidate for President by the Republican Party could be had.

I have not any objection to any method which shall be fair. That is not a reason for joining or giving up the party. It is the principles that the party advocates that should control one in its support. It is not that the Republican Party is desirous of holding office or power, though neither is to be despised, but it is that in this crisis we feel that we have the means of preventing the country from taking a step which, if taken, will precipitate us into governmental chaos, will set the country on a chimerical chase for an ideal that is impossible to realize, and that in this chase the country will lose the inestimable benefits of a permanent popular government that we have developed after a thousand years of struggle and have created, maintained, and preserved inviolate for 125 years of national liberty. We are not bitter; we are not cast down; we are not vengeful.

If the people of the United States can stand a Democratic administration for one or two or even more terms, we shall certainly not object to their capacity for endurance in this regard; but what we wish to assure ourselves of is that neither through Democratic radicalism nor through the Progressive radicalism shall the pillars of our noble state be pulled down and the real cause of the people be sacrificed to dreams of demagogues and theorists.

Let us buckle on our armor again for the battle for humanity and the common people that must be fought.

Let us invite those Republicans who left us under an impulse that calmer consideration shows to have been unwise to return and stand again shoulder to shoulder with us in this critical time in our country's history.

Let us invite from the ranks of our opponents the Democrats—the many who love the Constitution and the blessings it has conferred on our people—to unite with us in its defense. It must be a campaign of education among the common people against the poison of class hatred, the fanaticism of unbalanced enthusiasts, the sophistry of demagogic promises, and the wiles of false friends of humanity.

REPRINT OF POST OFFICE BILL.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill H. R. 27148, a bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] asks unanimous consent for a reprint of the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman in conversation with me expressed the desire to have a reprint of the bill corrected, and as he has stated it it would not be a mere reprint.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee desires a reprint to conform to the facts and figures. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. BOOHER, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Daniel O'Connor (H. R. 12735), Sixty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 26874, the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 26874, with Mr. SAUNDERS in the chair.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, when we adjourned on last Saturday I had made a point of order against an amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. PRAY] after the figures in line 16, page 16, to insert a new paragraph. The appropriation was for $75,000, for the purpose of making certain surveys, which is not incorporated in the bill.

Mr. PRAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] yield to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. PRAY]?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. For the purpose of discussing the point of order only?

Mr. PRAY. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman for five minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. PRAY. I do not think it necessary for the gentleman to yield. I ask for recognition to discuss the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Montana [Mr. PRAY] desire to address himself to the point of order?

Mr. PRAY. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. PRAY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is for the purpose of enabling the department to survey land on Indian reservations in Montana, land on the Tongue River or Northern Cheyenne Reservation, land within the Fort Belknap Indian Reservation, and for making a meander survey around Flathead Lake, so as to identify the lands embraced within the powersite withdrawal of 100 linear feet around that lake back from the high-water mark for the year 1909, together with other survey work on Indian reservations not provided for in the pending bill.

This amendment, Mr. Chairman, is based upon authority of existing law. The purpose of these surveys is to provide allotments for the Indians. The authority for the surveys, and consequently for this appropriation, will be found in the general allotment act of February 8, 1887, which provides for the allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians, and necessarily the surveys must be made before the allotments can be made.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask the gentleman a question. I notice that a part of the amendment provides for surveying lands in the Tongue River and Northern Cheyenne Indian Reservations.

Mr. PRAY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman give the Chair the authority for that particular work under existing law?

Mr. PRAY. That is based, Mr. Chairman, as I regard it, upon the general allotment act which I have quoted and upon which the general appropriation in this bill is based. This amendment carries a specific appropriation for this work which is not intended to be provided for under the general item; and the department has estimated for this appropriation and recommended the performance of this work, and this amendment is in exact accord therewith; and, furthermore, it is authorized by the statute I have cited, and is therefore supported by existing law.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman let me call his attention to this fact, that out of this general sum for the survey of lands a portion was used for the survey of lands on the Tongue River and the Northern Cheyenne River? And is the gentleman aware of the fact that for the completion of the survey of lands in the Flathead Lake Indian Reservation some $29,000 was expended last year out of the general appropriation? Is the gentleman aware of that? The general appropriation is in this language:

For the survey, resurvey, classification, appraisement, and allotment of lands in severalty under the provisions of the act of February 8, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians," and under any other act or acts providing for the survey and allotment of lands in severalty to Indians; and for the survey and subdivision of Indian reservations and lands to be allotted to Indians under authority of law, $200,000, to be repaid proportionately out of any Indian moneys held in trust or otherwise by the United States and available by law for such reimbursable purpose and to remain available until expended.

That last clause would fairly cover the purpose of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. PRAY. I know it is true that up to the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, $29,000 was taken from the general fund for these surveys on Indian reservations. But a much larger amount is needed at the present time. Therefore the department officials have asked for a special appropriation of $75,000, and have taken no account of this work in their estimates for the general appropriation this year. Under that general item for surveys they asked for $250,000, and you cut it down to $200,000. Yet I have the positive assurance of officials at the department that they will be unable to use but very little, if any, portion of the general appropriation for these important surveys, and they insist that these surveys should be made at the beginning of the next season.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But we are appropriating in this bill $200,000, and there was a part of the appropriation last year that was not used.

Mr. PRAY. I know about that, and also that you did not come within $50,000 of the general estimates, and I do know, further, that the department will be unable to take any portion of the funds from that general appropriation for the very necessary purpose set forth in this amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If they could take $20,000 of last year, why can they not complete it this year with the appropriation?

Mr. PRAY. They took that amount in 1911, but even so, it was totally inadequate, and they can not do the work without a special appropriation. This amendment is based on existing law, upon the act supporting the general appropriation. And furthermore, the provision included in the amendment in regard to surveys on the Flathead Reservation is based upon the act of a year ago, which provides that an easement in and over all lands bordering on or adjacent to Flathead Lake, which lie below an elevation of 9 feet above the high-water mark of this lake for the year 1909, shall be reserved for use in connection with storage of water for irrigation or development of water power. All patents hereafter issued under this law must include such reservation. It is necessary to make the survey to fix the contour line. The law can not be compiled with without a survey. The estimate for this particular work is $25,000. This is included in the Book of Estimates, and appears in the hearings. The other feature of the amendment relates to survey on the Fort Belknap Reservation—$25,000 is needed for this purpose. The recommendation is noted in the hearings and in the Book of Estimates. This survey is for allotment purposes and authority for the appropriation will be found in the general allotment act before alluded to. This amendment, in my judgment, is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They have used, as I have stated, $29,000 of the general appropriation last year for beginning this survey, and this year we have made an appropriation of $200,000 for completing the survey.

This amendment of the gentleman from Montana is subject to a point of order for the reason that it has not been estimated for, is not in the bill, and does not come legitimately before the committee at this time. It is new legislation.

Mr. PRAY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says that this legislation has not been estimated for. He does not mean that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I mean it is not in the bill.

Mr. PRAY. The department has estimated for it and has said that it is absolutely necessary that they should have the $75,000 recommended. Besides that, it is authorized by the law carrying the general appropriation that was inserted at the beginning of this bill.

This is not the only item affecting Montana estimated for by the department which does not appear in the bill. The department asked for an appropriation of $10,000 for indigent and homeless Indians, such as Chief Rocky Boy and his band of Chippewas and the poverty-stricken Cree Indians who were under Chief Little Bear. This item does not appear in the bill, although there is great poverty and distress among these Indians; and this same condition exists among the aged Indians on some of the reservations. Chouteau County, my home county, expended $6,000 to take care of the Cree Indians during an epidemic of smallpox, and when I introduced a bill in the Sixtieth Congress for reimbursement the verdict was that the liability of the Government was too remote. In my humble judgment the Government is and ought to be liable for the support of helpless Indians. They are the wards of the Government and entitled to help under such distressing circumstances.

This amendment is meritorious and ought to prevail, but it will doubtless meet the same fate as other amendments that have been proposed for the purpose of increasing appropriations. This appropriation is necessary; it is properly estimated for and fully justified in the hearings, and, furthermore, it is authorized by the same law that supports the general item on page 2 of the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The reference that has been made to existing law is urged in support of the amendment. No intelligent ruling can be made on the question in the absence of that law, and the Chair will therefore ask the gentleman from Montana [Mr. PRAY] to send the law to the desk, and the Chair will reserve a ruling on this point of order until he can look at the law which is relied upon.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Shall we proceed with the bill, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The Chair states that for the time being we will proceed with the bill, and at a later opportunity the Chair will make a ruling.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we pass over the item for the present until we can ascertain the authority.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that will be done. The Clerk will read.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEENERSON. I would like to inquire what became of the amendment that I offered on Saturday?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota on Saturday was passed over without prejudice, with a point of order pending. I made the point of order, and after an examination of the statements in the RECORD of Saturday, I desire to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I also have a point of order pending, I think. The amendment is just as it was on Saturday, as I understand from the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; it is pending.

Mr. FOSTER. It occurs to me that this matter should be taken up in the regular way by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to determine whether or not it is advisable to authorize this. And there is a question as to the right of the Red Lake Indians to have an interest in this matter, so that it occurred to me that in view of all those facts this matter ought not to go into this bill.

Mr. MANN. I understood that it was agreeable to the committee. Is not that correct?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. It was considered in the committee.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We have made a favorable report on the amendment. We had a special meeting of the committee and agreed to this amendment; agreed that it might be offered on the floor. It is not in the bill, but I desire to state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] that the committee agreed to this amendment at a special meeting.

Mr. FOSTER. But the committee has never reported a bill on the subject and placed in on the calendar.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It has been the custom, Mr. Chairman, for a number of years that the committee could be authorized to offer, through its chairman, on the floor such amendments, and we have followed that custom in this instance, for the reason that the data were not before the committee at the time we reported the appropriation bill; else we would have reported it with the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. FOSTER. It does seem to me that this amendment ought not to be put on at this time, without giving opportunity for a study of this question. I am not saying that this matter is not all right, but it does not occur to me that it ought to go in here.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman reserve the point until I can make a further explanation?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. I have no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, before my colleague [Mr. STEENERSON] makes his statement, I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] to the fact that this is the only way to get any legislation through at this session of Congress. It is undoubtedly right that under ordinary circumstances a bill should be introduced and passed upon by the committee and reported to the House and taken up by itself, but under the present condition of things the gentleman from Illinois knows, as every one of us knows, that there will be no legislation on this subject at this session of Congress—that is, this year—unless it is done by way of amendment to this bill. Now, this is not a large item. It is really quite an insignificant item, but it is important to a large number of Indians. Unless this survey can be secured in this bill it will not be secured at all. Unless this drainage survey can be made or authorized within a year, it is probable that it never can be made for the welfare of these Indians.

Mr. FOSTER. Why does the gentleman make that statement?

Mr. MILLER. The allotments may be made up there in that region before it can ever be reached, and if that should be done the opportunity for a survey of this kind would be largely removed.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This is reimbursable, and is an unexpended balance of an appropriation for a survey partly made. The time expired before they could complete the survey, and this provision is for the expenditure of the unexpended balance for the survey.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the point of order made against the amendment?

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a further explanation.

Mr. FOSTER. I will hear the gentleman's explanation, and if it is satisfactory I may withdraw the point of order.

Mr. STEENERSON. I can realize that the zeal of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] requires him to consider this matter very carefully. I desire to say that it was presented to the committee at a special meeting and approved. Now, this reappropriation is part of an appropriation made reimbursable out of the funds of the Indians, and then, in order to recoup the amount of the expenditure for a drainage survey, the price of the unsold lands originally contributed by the Red Lake Indians, being 1,500,000 acres, was raised 3 cents an acre. Eventually that will bring back into the Treasury more than the sum appropriated or expended for the drainage survey. We have appropriated $35,000 and have spent $30,000. The money was appropriated especially for a drainage survey, and this being money of the Indians, proposed to be expended for the benefit of the Indians, it seems to me that some consideration should be given to those who represent those Indians. It is simply a method of using the property of the Indians for their own benefit, and it is not tenable to say that this money belongs to the United States.

I notice that several erroneous statements were made in the debate on this matter on Saturday. My colleague from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] in a colloquy admitted that this money, derived from the increase in the price of the sale of the Indian lands, would belong to the United States. Now, that is not correct, because the land was conveyed to the United States under the act of 1889 by the Indians in trust for the purpose of being disposed of, and when the price is increased the trustee does not get the benefit of the increased price, but it inures to the benefit of the cestui que trust. Therefore this money ultimately belongs to the Red Lake Indians who furnished the 3,000,000 acres to be put into the pot and sold to raise the common fund. The act which made the appropriation made it reimbursable, and I can not see why this item should not now be agreed to. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] will withdraw his point of order, that he will not insist upon it, because it is necessary to have this survey made this summer in order to make the allotment. I do not understand that it is the policy of the department to allot the agricultural lands on the Red Lake Reservation without first making this survey. That is the object of this item—to get a survey and to find out how much agricultural land there is available for allotments in severalty.

It is the first step toward an allotment of lands in severalty. All the agricultural and timber lands on this reservation are now held in common. This has been asked for at three or four meetings, and it seems to me that in view of the fact that the Indians are unanimous, both factions of them, and in view of the fact that the Representative in Congress from that district, who has visited this reservation within the last 60 days and inquired into this matter, is strongly in favor of it, some consideration ought to be given to the wishes of the Indians, whose money we are appropriating, and to the statements of the Representative from that district. I therefore hope that the gentleman will withdraw his point of order.

While I am on my feet I desire to say that the record of the debate of last Saturday does not clearly show what the so-called Eleven Towns were sold for.

To show what was realized from the Eleven Towns, I will print the following statement from the Crookston Land Office:

ELEVEN TOWNS.

During the several councils held by the Red Lake Chippewa Indians during the past summer, reference has been made by many of the older Indians to the matter of the sale of the "Eleven Towns" bordering the west end of the present reservation. It will be remembered that the purchase price as agreed by the Indians for this tract was $1,000,000. The fact of the matter is that this consideration has been exceeded to the benefit of the Indians to the amount of $260,000, as shown by the following letter:

CROOKSTON, MINN., September 27, 1912.

Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON,
Crookston, Minn.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request we submit the following figures, which are a revision of our report to you under date of March 6, 1912, to and including this date:

Area of Eleven Towns	acres	265,000
Entered to date	do	262,000
Unentered land	do	3,000
Purchase price of land heretofore entered		$1,260,000
Amount paid		1,055,000
Unpaid balance		205,000

The unentered area is subject to sale at the minimum price of $4 per acre.

Respectfully,

A. P. TOUPIN,
Register, Crookston Land Office.

It will be seen that these lands were sold for $260,000 more than the Indians had agreed to take for them under the McLaughlin agreement. So it appears that these matters have been handled with skill by the department, and the Indians are perfectly satisfied that they have been fairly and liberally treated in this matter. I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] to allow this survey to be made. Otherwise the whole matter will be delayed for a year.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment it is not a good plan to take up a matter of this kind, involving a project of this magnitude, on an appropriation bill, and I think the House probably has some reason to complain if amendments are put on in some other body and come back here for adoption by this House when we have had no opportunity to consider them. But as I am informed by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], that this matter has been fully considered in the committee and approved, and in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] who knows the situation, I feel that I am willing to take his word for this and the action of the committee, and I therefore withdraw the point of order.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois withdraws the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FERRIS. I may be mistaken about it, but I do not recall that there was any disposition of the pending amendment of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. PRAY].

Mr. MANN. That was laid over temporarily.

The CHAIRMAN. It was agreed to pass that over for the present. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEBRASKA.

SEC. 11. For support and education of 300 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Genoa, Nebr., and for pay of superintendent, $52,100; for general repairs and improvements, $4,500; in all, $56,100.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have a committee amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 18, after the word "hundred," add the words "and seventy-five." Line 20, strike out "52,100" and make it "62,300." In line 21, strike out "56,100" and insert in lieu thereof "66,800."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the reason for making that amendment is this: The general bill provides for 300 Indians at the Genoa School, Nebraska. We find that there are enrolled there 373 pupils, and we have made no provision for 73 of them. We find that the bill does not provide for 73 Indians, and therefore on a pro rata appropriation we offer this amendment to cover those 73 Indians unprovided for.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee if the attendance at this school last year was not 375 pupils, in round numbers?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Three hundred and seventy-three.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. They conducted the school upon an appropriation that was made for 300.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is right.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now it is proposed to increase the appropriation without increasing the attendance, if I understand the chairman correctly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They were not provided for last year, for the reason that it was not called to the attention of the House or the Committee on Indian Affairs that they had 73 additional Indians in the school there which the appropriation did not cover.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I understood the gentleman to say that the attendance of the school last year was 373—that is, this year—and that they have been able to take care of that number with the appropriation that was made for the school.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. My secretary calls my attention to the fact that there were only 318 pupils last year; that is, they had 18 over the 300 that were appropriated for. This year they have 373 pupils, or 73 above the number appropriated for.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask if this was an item passed upon by the committee. I was not able to be present at the last meeting of the committee.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; it was presented, and the committee authorized the chairman to offer this amendment because they have the additional number of pupils there not provided for.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will call the gentleman's attention to one thing that caused me to make the inquiry, and that is, in considering the bill we did not allow in any case an increase of the appropriation to provide for an attendance greater than we had before.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If that had been called to the attention of the committee at the time we passed the bill we would have provided for 373 pupils or required them not to add that number to the school; but as they were enrolled, and have been for the last six months, from September to the present time, we think they ought to have the present amount.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is there any deficiency item this year for this school? In other words, if they now have 373 pupils at this school, and the appropriation in the bill is the same as for the current appropriation law, you propose to increase the amount of the bill. Is that based upon the proposition that there is a deficiency appropriation for this year?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not understand whether there will be a deficiency or not, for I have not the records before me at the present time.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman from Texas yield for a question?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOWLER. I see by the amendment that you increase the appropriation $200 above that of the last appropriation bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Ten thousand two hundred dollars, for the reason that we have 73 pupils more than the bill provides for.

Mr. FOWLER. I understand you ran the school last year on $66,200, with the same number of pupils.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No; that is where the gentleman is in error. We only had 318 pupils, and now we have 373.

Mr. MANN. And that included $10,000 for a special purpose that had nothing to do with the maintenance of the pupils.

Mr. FOWLER. I understand there is no deficiency from the last appropriation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have not had an opportunity to examine that question.

Mr. FOWLER. Does not the gentleman think the school could be run on the same amount of appropriation for the coming year that was made the last year?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It could, but we only had 318 pupils last year. Now we have 373, and these additional pupils will require the additional amount.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, on last Saturday, while the House was in Committee of the Whole considering the Indian appropriation bill, I was called from the Chamber by a constituent, who detained me for several minutes. During my temporary absence it appears that the Seminole Indians of Florida, and indeed Florida herself, were quite fully discussed by a number of gentlemen. In the course of the debate, which was supposed to relate to a certain item of appropriation for the Florida Seminoles, the following colloquy, as shown by the RECORD at page 998, took place:

Mr. FERRIS. I desire to say to the gentleman that the President has really taken some steps. These Indians in the Everglades are as wild as rabbits, and up to this time they have not been able to do anything with them; but the President has by Executive order set aside a tract of land comprising 85,000 acres, and the Indian Office has tried to get these Indians on it, tried to get hold of them, lasso them, or catch them in some other way and put them on it.

Mr. MANN. This talk about the Indians being so wild is all fudge.

Mr. FERRIS. Well, the Indian Office does not say so.

Mr. MANN. What do they know about it?

Mr. FERRIS. They have been down there.

Mr. MANN. They sent one man on a winter trip, at a cost of $154; that is all they know about it. They do not know anything about it. There never was any occasion for the Government spending a cent on these Indians down there; they are not asking it.

Mr. FERRIS. They have not got sense enough to ask for anything.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman need not be alarmed; they have got a great deal more sense than some of the native Crackers of Florida and are quite able to take care of themselves; they are pretty bright people down there.

It will be observed, Mr. Chairman, that the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma likens the brave remnant of Seminoles left in my State to "rabbits," and the great leader of the minority, the gentleman from Illinois, solemnly declares that the Seminoles "have a great deal more sense than some of the native Crackers of Florida." Mr. Chairman, I can not allow these statements to go unchallenged and by my silence appear to acquiesce in them; and I ask the House to bear with me for a few moments while I submit a few observations relative to them.

I was amazed when I read the language of the gentleman from Oklahoma, who has so large an Indian constituency, wherein he compares this remnant of a once populous and warlike tribe of Indians to "rabbits." I assert, Mr. Chairman, without the slightest fear of successful contradiction, that no braver people among all the nations and tribes of American Indians ever inhabited this continent than those who followed the waving plume of Osceola. It is true they are uneducated, but that is not their fault. It is the fault of this great Christian Government, which has forcibly deprived them of their all and left them in poverty and ignorance to meet the issues of a new life. If you really wish to help the Seminoles of Florida, establish schools among them, with faithful and competent instructors, and lift them up intellectually, so that they may assume the duties of citizenship and become factors in our much boasted civilization. Let my friend from Oklahoma quit referring to them as "rabbits," but rather let his committee bring in a bill making provision for the education and elevation of these unfortunate people.

But, Mr. Chairman, I desire more particularly to address myself to the reference made by the great minority leader to the Florida "Cracker." Mr. Chairman, "Cracker" is a title proudly worn by every true Floridian, whether he be a son of that great Commonwealth by birth or by adoption. The man who lives in Florida for two or three years, whether he hails from the North, the East, the West, or some other portion of the South, assumes the title of "Florida Cracker," and wears it as a badge of the greatest honor. And why should not he be proud of the distinction, Mr. Chairman? Gen. Edmund Kirby Smith, one of the greatest, one of the manliest, one of the bravest of that magnificent body of men who constituted the commanding officers of the Confederate States army, was a native-born "Florida Cracker." Gen. Edward A. Perry, although born in Massachusetts, was a "Florida Cracker" by adoption, and as brigadier general in the Confederate army illustrated his dauntless bravery and unflinching courage on many hard-fought fields. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Dr. John Gorrie, the gentle and faithful physician who invented the process for manufacturing ice artificially, and thus became the greatest benefactor to humanity of modern times, was a "Florida Cracker." And I could fill the RECORD with the names of individual "Florida Crackers" who have become eminent in some field of human activity, but time will not permit. I can not, however, let this opportunity pass without calling attention to the fact that Florida has only been in the Union for 68 years; the Civil War and other causes delayed her development, and she really only began her march of progress within the last quarter of a century. She is in reality a pioneer State to-day. Her resources have hardly been touched, and no human mind can foresee the vast possibilities in store for her. To the original pioneers, those sturdy Americans, unlettered it is true, but as brave and patriotic souls as ever heard the war cry of the savage, who conquered Florida, is due the credit of giving this magnificent domain to the American Union. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Florida may continue for five minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to complete this bill to-day, and I shall have to object.

Mr. MANN. How much time does the gentleman desire in which to conclude?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will get through in 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Florida may continue for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Florida may continue for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, they and their descendants are the people to whom the distinguished gentleman from Illinois refers to as so lacking in sense. These men who blazed the pathway of civilization through the primeval forests, exterminated the wild beasts of the jungle, conquered and reduced to subjection the untutored but warlike and courageous Seminole, may not have been as cultured and polished as the collegian, but they were the bravest of the brave; they were as honest as honesty itself; in their veins flowed the purest strain of American blood, and their every heartbeat was attuned to the sweet song of human freedom.

Mr. Chairman, the "Florida Cracker" of to-day possesses every element of manhood which made glorious the record of his ancestry, and I repudiate with all the force I can command the imputation that he is not in every essential respect the equal of any man who walks upon the earth.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the very atmosphere of Florida conduces not only to a broadening of the intellectual man, but it tempers and refines the moral sensibilities. The "Florida Cracker" has "sense" enough to keep on the statute books of his State a law which forever makes impossible the shocking of the moral sense of all decent people by the union of a half-witted white girl with a black negro brute. If the culture, refinement, and "sense" of Chicago is exemplified in the recent legal marriage of the negro brute Jack Johnson and that poor, miserable white girl, then may the great God of the heavens and the earth forever deliver my people from the Chicago variety. The "Florida Cracker" has "sense" enough to know that God Almighty never intended that the black crow should roost where the gray eagle builded her nest; he has "sense" enough to know that the Great Creator, for some reason of his own, in the very dawn of human existence, separated the white and black races by insurmountable barriers; and he has "sense" enough to have no patience with that class of alleged white men and women who, having no pride of race, would set aside the solemn decree of the Almighty and by amalgamation bring the proud Caucasian to the level of the brute African and make of this great Republic a Nation of mongrels. He has "sense" enough, decency enough, love of race enough, and enough reverence for the decrees of Almighty God, no matter what the people of other lands and other States may do, to forever preserve the white civilization of Florida from the degradation of social equality with the negro. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, Florida, with her balmy climate, her health-giving springs, her beautiful lakes, her magnificent rivers, her wonderfully productive soil, invites the citizen of every section to come and live and enjoy life within her borders. He will find us a generous, warm-hearted, and hospitable people. We care not where he was born; that is immaterial. We care not what may be his politics or his religion; that is his business. But we do not care to have him come laboring under any mistaken idea as to our purpose to maintain our present civilization. When he comes to Florida he comes to a State where white supremacy obtains and will be maintained; he comes to a State where the virtue of women is the chief corner stone of the structure and will be protected; and he comes to a State where the institutions of our Government are to be preserved as established by the fathers of the Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the last amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. This seems to include more than one amendement. If there be no objection, the amendments will be considered en bloc. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of 1 clerk at $1,400, 1 financial clerk at $1,200, 1 assistant clerk at $720, and 1 laborer at $720, at Winnebago Agency, Nebr.; in all, $4,040.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on this paragraph. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the committee the necessity for this new legislation. I discover that the bill last session did not carry this appropriation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that this is taken out of the lump-sum appropriation, and that amount is deducted from the lump-sum appropriation because it was considered by the department to be good legislation, so that they could be directed how much they shall expend in this State at this place. This specific expenditure is deducted from the lump-sum appropriation carried in the fore part of the bill. It does not cost the Government any more, and it specifically directs how this amount shall be expended.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the lump-sum appropriation carry an appropriation for the different places that are provided for in this paragraph?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The aggregate amount of the lump sum included this appropriation, but it was thought better legislation to put this provision in the bill, and it was so drafted by the department.

Mr. FOWLER. As a matter of fact does this school have a financial clerk, an assistant clerk, and a laborer at this agency?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. In the Winnebago Agency, Nebr., there is a school, and this is for the whole State of Nebraska. There is quite a large agency there—agency buildings—and they have general supervision of all of the Indians in that State. I do not remember the number of Indians, but there is quite a number of Indians in that State. These clerks have to manage the affairs of that agency and do all of the clerical work.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman does not answer the question. Have these positions been carried at this agency, at the Winnebago Agency, prior to the bringing of this bill?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They have for a number of years. They have the same number and the same pay. They do the same labor as the others. There is one laborer provided for at $720.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, with the assurance that it costs no more, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Before the gentleman withdraws the point of order, will he still reserve it for a moment until I can ask a question?

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Out of what item in the bill is this taken?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but where is the item, the lump-sum appropriation, that carries it now?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The amount is $80,960, for the pay of employees, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. That is for the pay of employees not otherwise provided for?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; lines 14 to 17, page 7:

For pay of employees not otherwise provided for; and for other necessary expenses of the Indian service for which no other appropriation is available, $80,960.

One hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars was carried in that item last year, and we reduced it to $80,960 this year, because we have made this change in several Indian reservations. We thought it was more desirable, and so did the department.

Mr. MANN. As I understood the statement the other day, it was that the reduction was made on account of the agency in Oklahoma.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think we followed that rule in a good many agencies.

Mr. MANN. There were a lot of special agents in Oklahoma.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] is acquainted with that matter.

Mr. MANN. I think the statement was made that the reduction in that item was because there was no provision in the bill this year for certain special agents in Oklahoma, to cover which the amount was increased in the Senate last year.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Illinois is correct in that statement; but I think, however, in addition to that deduction, that there is to be made another one for these segregated items. I am not entirely familiar with all of the details of this, excepting that my recollection is distinct that information was furnished the committee, or at least myself when I passed upon the matter in my own mind, that this was a deduction from the lump sum which had been expended heretofore, and, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] has well said, similar segregations are to be found in two or three other instances. For one I think it is vastly preferable to have each item segregated by itself, so that when we make appropriations we may know the exact amount that is going to the different places.

Mr. MANN. Of course that depends upon whether it is more expensive, and whether they need all of these employees at this point.

Mr. MILLER. Of course, assuming the expense is not increased, and that the result will ultimately be a decrease. I do not think there is any question but that this is a reduction from the lump sum heretofore appropriated.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the construction of a bridge across the San Juan River at Shiprock, N. Mex., on the Navajo Indian Reservation, to be immediately available, $16,500.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on this paragraph. I desire to ask the chairman the necessity for the construction of this bridge.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state that last year a showing was made before the committee sufficient to convince them that it was necessary to construct this bridge, and we appropriated $1,000 for plans and specifications and a survey across the river at this point. This is what I find the department says in justification of this amendment:

For the construction of a bridge across the San Juan River at Shiprock, N. Mex., on the Navajo Indian Reservation, to be immediately available, $16,500.

This bridge is to replace a bridge at Shiprock, N. Mex., which was totally destroyed by a flood, on October 6, 1911. The San Juan River is a dangerous one to ford, and the loss of the bridge is, therefore, a serious one for the Indians, as well as to the agency employees and white people with whom the Indians have business relations. The proper handling of the affairs of the Indians renders the reconstruction of this bridge imperative, as more than half of the Indians on the San Juan Reservation live south of the river, the agency being located on the north side of it.

In the act of August 24, 1912, Congress appropriated $1,000 for an investigation and report as to the necessity for this bridge and an estimated limit cost thereof, which report has been submitted in accordance with the provisions of the act. (See House Doc. No. 1015, 62d Cong., 3d sess.)

Mr. FOWLER. Who made the investigation?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It was made by the engineers of the Indian Department.

Mr. FOWLER. Have you the report?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have the report here. It is a public document, No. 1015, Sixty-second Congress, third session.

I will state to the gentleman that if there is a bridge in the United States which should be built, this is the one, because the Indians are all on one side of the river and the business on the other side, and at one time an overflow took out the abutments of the bridge which was there.

Mr. FOWLER. Why is not that in the hearings?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. When we had a document setting forth all of this information, it certainly would not have been right or justifiable to cause the Government to have reprinted something that we already had before us.

Mr. FOWLER. While that may be true, those Members who are not members of the Committee on Indian Affairs are not always able to lay thair hands on every piece of information which they desire.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This is a document, I will state, that every man can get by sending to the document room for it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] yield?

Mr. FOWLER. I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] or the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for a question.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] a question. New Mexico now being a State of the Union, would it not be the province of that State to build this bridge and tax the property of the people of that State for that purpose, instead of the National Government?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the gentleman will permit me to state, this bridge was built originally by the Government for the Indians, and was washed away. This is a very large reservation, possibly 100 miles from end to end, and about that distance wide. These Indians, as I have stated, are on the opposite side of the river, where they are occupied in farming, while the railroad and the places in which they do business are on the other side of the river. I am advised that the river is so dangerous on account of quicksands, and so forth, that it is often difficult to get to these places.

Mr. CULLOP. But the property of the people in these towns who get advantage of the trade of the Indians ought to be taxed as other property of that State now is taxed, for the purpose of building this project. They are the beneficiaries and ought to bear the expense of this improvement.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No Indian land is taxable.

Mr. CULLOP. I am not referring to the Indian land, but the other property there which is taxable, the railroad, the stores, the lands of the citizens of the State, just as the property in other States is taxed for public improvement. Why should not this property in the State of New Mexico be taxed for the purpose of building this bridge, which is a public improvement of the State, instead of the United States Government bearing the expense of it?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON].

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Chairman, I am personally acquainted with the situation where this bridge is located in New Mexico, and in answer to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] I will state that the larger part of the reservation where the Indians are located is on the southern side of the San Juan River. The railroad and coal mines are on the north side. When a few years ago they came to establish an agency and a school for these Indians they established it on the north side of the river, for the reason that the railroad and station are on that side and the coal is mined on that side of the river, and therefore they established the agency and school on the side of the river where the railroad was located and where the coal was mined for convenience. So, in answer to the gentleman from Indiana, I will state that it is a part of the Government's business to build this bridge across the river in order to connect the body of the reservation with the other side of the river. It is Government business and not the business of the citizens of the State there. The report of the constructing engineer, which was adopted by the Secretary of the Interior, in recommending this bridge, shows the reasons more succinctly than I can state them, among which are that the river has quicksands, that it is wide and flows over sand, that it is almost for half a year unfordable and impassable, and that the Indians have large numbers of ponies, hides, and wool which they have to transfer across the river. These Navajos are industrious. It is necessary to get across to the railroad and to the towns where the Americans live, where they find a market for their blankets. For half a year the river is unfordable and impassable, as is shown by the Secretary of the Interior in his report in favor of this item. We think it is a part of the Government business. This Government agency is a very large one. The Indians are industrious and prosperous. Their blankets are getting an international reputation and are sold all over the world. They have their sheep and cattle. I have seen in the streets of Albuquerque herds of 200 or 300 ponies brought down to sell. The Indians are worthy of the help that is asked in this matter in order to get across the river to the markets on the other side, to the coal, and to the railroad supplies.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Mexico a question if he will permit. How large is the town across the river from this reservation?

Mr. FERGUSSON. I do not remember exactly. I should say it had fifteen hundred to two thousand population.

Mr. CULLOP. Is Farmington the name of the town?

Mr. FERGUSSON. That is not immediately near where this bridge is to be. I have not the exact figures at hand, but if the gentleman desires he can get them. The agency is located on one side of the river, approximately 40 miles west of Farmington.

Mr. CULLOP. Does not the public use this bridge?

Mr. FERGUSSON. To some extent these Indians do business with the general public. That is where they sell their blankets and hides and wool.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think the explanation made by the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON] of the conditions existing there, and the explanation made by the chairman of the committee, who also is conversant with the conditions there, makes it the more essential that this bridge ought to be built by the citizens of New Mexico under the laws of that State as other public improvements are made. This is not a bridge for the Indians alone, but it is a bridge for public convenience, people of all classes. Their products are taken to market there and put upon the trade of the world. It is a growing commerce, just like the commerce of other citizens and localities, just as the products of other people are turned into the marts of trade. I can see no reason why the people of New Mexico should not be taxed to build this bridge just as the people of other States are taxed for public improvements within their boundaries. In my judgment it would not be right to make the improvements contemplated out of the public funds of the National Government. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] will insist upon his point of order.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. While I am not familiar with the constitution of the State of New Mexico, I assume that it is similar to the constitutions of other States of the Union, and if so, I ask the gentleman if there would be any authority of law on the part of the legislature of the State, or any of its subdivisions, or the taxing power, to expend the funds of the State or county or city to build this bridge wholly on United States territory, on a United States reservation?

Mr. CULLOP. Oh, that matter could be very easily adjusted by coming to Congress and getting a bill passed, granting permission to build the bridge, just as railroads do it, and just as dams are constructed by private owners. And the taxing power of the State of New Mexico could be invoked to tax the property and raise the funds to build the bridge just as internal improvements are made in every other State of the Union.

Mr. MILLER. I am quite sure the gentleman does not mean just that. I am sure that if he will stop a moment and reflect he will not say that.

Mr. CULLOP. I mean exactly what I say. The Congress has the power to grant to the government of the State of New Mexico the right to bridge any of its streams.

Mr. MILLER. That is absolutely true; but evidently the gentleman did not catch the point of what I intended to say. Perhaps I did not make it clear. There is no power possessed by the State of New Mexico or any subdivision of that State to appropriate the funds of that State to build a bridge wholly upon United States territory or upon a United States reservation.

Mr. CULLOP. Well, if the taxing power of New Mexico does not go that far in building up the public improvements of the State, the internal improvements of the State, its people have been neglectful in exercising the powers which the legislature of that State should have exercised in building up and advancing the best interests of the State. Every other State, practically every other one, is exercising just such a power as that. New Mexico could do so if it exercised the powers granted it.

Mr. MILLER. I beg to differ with the gentleman.

Mr. CULLOP. I hardly know of any State that has the power to make a law to tax the property of a locality for public improvements, a power which is not denied under the Federal Constitution and is provided for in the constitutions of the several States of the Union. It could easily get authority from the National Government to construct this bridge, though it be located on Federal property.

Mr. MILLER. We do not differ on that at all; but I still have not made myself clear, I am sorry to say. While the State of New Mexico undoubtedly possesses the powers for public improvements similar to those possessed by other States, neither New Mexico nor any other State has the right or power to appropriate its money to build an improvement on anybody else's territory. In this case it is the territory of the United States. It has no more power to do that than it has the right to appropriate money to build a bridge in Alaska, or on the moon, or in Germany, or in Indiana. [Laughter.]

Mr. CULLOP. Oh, that is not the proposition involved here. Here is property in the State of New Mexico which is subject to the control of that State. I understand that it is Federal property, and the Federal authorities can grant a concession to build the bridge. They have that right, and so has Congress the right to do it. This is not for the Indians alone, but it is for the general public of New Mexico. It is for the convenience of the general public in that section of that State, and is required as well for the requirements of the general public as for the Indians residing in that locality. It will improve the property of all, and the public good will be served by its erection, and for this reason I contend the people of that State should bear the expense thereof and not the National Government. In my judgment, there is a growing tendency to relieve the States of matters of this kind and fasten them on the Federal Government. This practice is unjustifiable and should not be employed. This particular matter belongs to the State of New Mexico and it should bear the cost of it, as it is the direct beneficiary of the good which will flow from this improvement.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. I do not now recall just what the constitution of New Mexico provides, but I know the constitution of Oklahoma sets forth that the taxes or funds of one community can not be used to build public improvements in another community.

Now, the gentleman will understand that here we have, as has been stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], who is in charge of the bill, a reservation of 100 miles square. There are no taxable lands; there is not property there of sufficient taxable value to build this bridge, so that it would be an impossibility to build the bridge, under the constitution of most States, unless the Federal Government did build it, because the taxable values do not exist within the community where the bridge is to be built.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the gentleman, if I may be permitted, whether the Sante Fe Railroad does not run through there, and whether that property is not subject to taxation?

Mr. CARTER. I understand that the Sante Fe Railroad does run through it, but how much of it is in this community and can be taxed for the purpose of building this bridge I do not know. Can any man say that there is sufficient mileage and property values of the Sante Fe Railroad there to build this bridge?

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to ask the gentleman this: How is it that a town of 2,000 population has been built up there? Where did it get the title to the improvements?

Mr. CARTER. That may be done in several ways. The town sites may have been disposed of. That would be one way.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate on this paragraph be ended in five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on this for a moment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understood that the gentleman from Illinois had withdrawn his point of order.

Mr. MANN. I had not.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, Mr. Chairman, I desire gentlemen to confine their remarks to the point of order and not to the general legislation in this bill.

Mr. CULLOP. The point of order is reserved. Now, in reply to what the gentleman has said——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that the gentleman from Indiana must confine himself to a discussion of the point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana have five minutes in which to discuss this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana have five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I shall have to object. I think we have had quite sufficient discussion, and the consideration of this bill must be concluded at some time. I therefore demand the regular order.

Mr. CULLOP. Let me have two minutes. That is all I care for.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask that the gentleman from Indiana have two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas withdraw his demand for the regular order?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will if we can close the debate on this at the end of seven minutes. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] desires five minutes to reply.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman include that in his request for unanimous consent?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that all debate be closed in seven minutes, five minutes to go to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that. I should like to have five minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I will make it 12 minutes if that is agreeable.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the present debate be concluded at the end of 12 minutes, five to be occupied by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], five by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and two by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Oklahoma upon this proposition, I have been informed that since 1866 there has been a Federal concession for improvements over lands of this character. Now, the Santa Fe Railroad runs through this reservation, or near it.

Mr. FERGUSSON. The nearest town on the south is about 150 miles away.

Mr. CULLOP. A city has been built up of probably 2,000 population. The power rests with the legislative branch of the government of New Mexico to legislate upon this question, to tax property owned by individuals for the purpose of making public improvements of this kind, and that power in instances of this kind ought to be employed by the States and not by the General Government. The State and its people get the advantage of such public improvements, and in common justice ought to pay for the same.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; if it is a short one, as I have but little time.

Mr. CARTER. I want to ask the gentleman if he knows that the town he speaks of is 34 miles from this bridge?

Mr. CULLOP. If you will tax the property of citizens of New Mexico to build this bridge out of State revenues, you will bring the town that much closer to them. That will be the result of that. It will build up their property, enhance values, and they will take an interest in the expenditure of their own money as a general result. In my judgment it is not right or proper for the Federal Government to be building bridges of this kind across these streams at the expense of the general public, when they are solely of a local character, for the purpose of improving the property of the citizens of New Mexico and advancing the best interests of the commerce of that State. I think improvements of this kind should be built by the local authorities and not by the General Government. The benefits derived are of a local nature and tend to develop the localities wherein situated, and the expense therefor should be borne by the people and property affected on account of the improvement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire of one of the gentlemen how many Indians there are living south of the river?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON].

Mr. FERGUSSON. I do not know exactly. There are 23,000 or 24,000 Indians, according to the statement of the Secretary of the Interior, and he says the vast majority of them live south of the river.

Mr. MANN. I notice that when the superintendent at Denver wired to the superintendent of the agency at Ship Rock for information he said, "Mail at once number of Indians living south of river." Then he asked him to mail any other data for use in reports justifying need of bridge. Apparently the superintendent at the agency did not think that to state the number of Indians south of the river could be used in justifying the need of the bridge, because, although he had been specifically directed to give that information, the only specific direction in the telegram, he did not give it, and in the report which he made he entirely failed to comply with the only specific request in the order that was given to him, namely, to give the number of Indians south of the river. The gentleman may have it.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Will the gentleman permit me to call his attention to this statement in the report of the Secretary of the Interior——

Mr. MANN. I will if he gives the number of Indians south of the river.

Mr. FERGUSSON. He says the most of them live on the south side of the river.

Mr. MANN. That does not give the information we are entitled to. Now, I call the attention of the gentleman from New Mexico to this proposition in the report of the agent to the superintendent. He stated this:

> A bridge at this place will not only be a great benefit and convenience to the Government in carrying on the agency work here and to the Indians, but it will be a great convenience to the white people of this valley who make frequent trips across the reservation to sell the products of their farms in towns along the Santa Fe Railroad.

It is proposed to have the Government of the United States build the bridge, although apparently it is mainly for the convenience of the white people who live in the valley and who are assumed to own their property, in order that they may make trips across the river and carry their products to towns along the Santa Fe Railroad.

Mr. FERGUSSON. The nearest town is something like 150 miles south, and this agency is 100 miles square. A large part of the business of the Government is on one side of the river and part is on the other side of the river, and the river is impassable during a part of the year.

Mr. MANN. Last year we made an appropriation for the purpose of ascertaining the facts with reference to this, and the only fact that is given in the report as the result of this appropriation of $1,000, outside of the engineering facts, is that this will be a great convenience to the white people of the valley for carrying their products to the towns along the Santa Fe Railroad.

Mr. FERGUSSON. It is a convenience to some of the white people.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt it is desirable to have the bridge. I think the people of New Mexico—the white people who use the bridge—ought to build one.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, in discussing a matter of this kind it is a good idea to understand the facts. If I misunderstood the situation, as does the gentleman from Illinois and to a greater extent the gentleman from Indiana, I think I should take their view of it. The gentleman from Indiana suggests that the Government should not build the bridge, and the gentleman from Illinois, quoting from the report, also suggests that because of the fact that occasionally the white people use this bridge it ought not to be built by the Government. The gentleman from Indiana emphasizes the fact that there is a town of 2,000 people—the town of Farmington—the inhabitants of which might occasionally use this bridge. Farmington is 30 miles from the site of this bridge. It is on another river—the Las Animas. The ford across the San Juan is dangerous, as I have personal knowledge.

A bridge is absolutely necessary to connect the two parts of the Navajo Reservation, and also to bring the part of the reservation lying south of the river where practically all of the Indians live in communication with the country in the north where the Indians sell their products. There may be occasionally a white man who would go from Farmington or Aztec to the towns on the Santa Fe over this bridge, but I can not understand why they would do that when they have a railroad at their door.

The people of New Mexico have built bridges across the Las Animas which enables the inhabitants to reach Farmington from the north side of the river. The people of New Mexico have fulfilled their duty in the matter. Some one should build this bridge; it ought not to be the people of New Mexico. I think the item should be reimbursable, for I believe the Indians will be able to ultimately pay for it. This bridge is wholly on the Indian reservation, and it is primarily for the benefit of the Indians. It is far within the borders of the reservation. The Navajos make fine blankets, which find a ready market, and carry on agricultural pursuits, and the bridge is necessary so that they may have communication with the north and sell their products. It is idle to talk about the people of New Mexico building the bridge. They have already built bridges in the territory adjacent to the reservation. It is idle to talk about asking them to build this bridge wholly within the reservation far from its borders.

Furthermore, this very bill contains a provision for the continuation of an irrigation project on the San Juan, and the necessity for communication between the north and south sides of the river is increasing and will be increased by the construction of the reclamation project.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the aqueduct that will carry the water is to be built across the bridge and whether the bridge is to be built for the purpose of carrying the aqueduct?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know that there is to be any aqueduct. The San Juan project is, I think, on the north side of the river. These Indians make blankets. They are highly advanced in their way, and this bridge is on their territory. I think the item ought to be made reimbursable, but the item must be provided for in this bill. The people of New Mexico have not the funds to build it, and I doubt if they have the legal right to build it. They certainly ought not to be required, in addition to building bridges across the rivers of the State outside of reservations, to go into Indian reservations and build bridges there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to accept the suggestion of the gentleman and make this item reimbursable. The Indian lands have not been sold but they have a vast territory which when sold I am told will be worth $5,000,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I do not wish to obstruct the progress that is now on for the construction of this bridge. I feel it is necessary that it should be constructed but I do not believe that the United States ought to build it. I understand that the Navajos are a very rich tribe and the people have something like $5,000,000 wealth; that this property where this bridge is to be constructed will be wholly upon their land and if it can be made reimbursable I will agree to withdraw the point of order, and yet I do not think that the Indians ought to build the bridge entirely. I believe the whites use it and ought to be required to help build it the same as the Indians, but in order to get out of the tangle I am willing to withdraw the point of order provided the sum will be made reimbursable.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is a very plain one and it is sustained.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> For the construction of a bridge across the San Juan River at Shiprock, N. Mex., on the Navajo Indian Reservation, to be immediately available, $16,500, the same to be reimbursable out of any funds said Indians may have or will have in the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. To that, Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas to let it go over a little while.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to pass the item at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked to pass this amendment temporarily and return to it later. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the pay of one special attorney for the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico and for necessary traveling expenses of said attorney, $2,000, or so much thereof as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman a question about this item. I notice here that you have an appropriation in this item for the pay of an attorney for the Pueblo Indians, but there is no such item, so far as I have observed, for any of the other tribes. Why is it that an appropriation is made to employ an attorney for this particular tribe of Indians?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman that the Pueblo Indians are not one tribe, but that there are many of them, possibly 10 or 12. The word "pueblo" is the Spanish name for town. They are town Indians. They have been there for several hundred years. Those Indians have been farming, and they have Spanish grants for their lands. The boundaries of these grants are indefinite. Farmers came in there, and questions arise in dispute between the farmers and the Indians. I will state that the lands are on the Rio Grande River. Some of the land is irrigable. Since the country has been settled up the white people have been infringing upon the lands of the Indians, and the grants not being well defined the Indians have constant troubles with their neighbors. The Indians, not being acquainted at all with the laws of the country, it has been deemed necessary that the Department of the Interior protect them. This item has been carried in the bill for several years, for the purpose of protecting those helpless Indians living in these pueblos, or towns.

Mr. CULLOP. Are these civilized Indians?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. As much so as any Indians could be. They were the original Indians found on this continent. They are possibly the survivors of the mound builders, as far as I know, and the cave dwellers were perhaps a part of these same Indians. That seems to be the best thought of the men who have studied this question.

Mr. CULLOP. Do they carry on farming?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. And stock raising and other business?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; more than any other Indians in the country.

Mr. CULLOP. And this attorney is simply to protect their titles as originally granted to them for their lands?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; by the Spanish Government. I will state that several suits are now pending.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 100 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Bismarck, N. Dak., and for pay of superintendent, $18,200; for general repairs and improvements, $2,000; in all, $20,200.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the reason why the appropriation for this agency is cut down from what it was two years ago by the sum of $2,500?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There was the construction of new buildings last year, and they have been completed. It was not necessary to longer carry the item.

Mr. FOWLER. Is that for the waterworks?

Mr. MANN. The provision was for the purchase of water and irrigation for the growing of trees, shrubs, and garden truck.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; that is the item. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 400 Indian pupils at Fort Totten Indian School, Fort Totten, N. Dak., and for pay of superintendent, $68,500; for general repairs and improvements, $6,000; in all, $74,500.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 8, after the figures "$6,000," insert the following:
"For construction of power house recently destroyed by fire and for installation, repair, and improvement of heating and lighting plant, $15,000, to be immediately available."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that the heating and lighting plant burned down a few weeks ago. That came to the knowledge of the committee since the bill was reported to the House. This is one of the few items that is an emergency item which the committee has authorized me to present to the House in the form of an amendment. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HELGESEN] can explain the item, as this is in his district.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman a question. Was there any insurance carried on the building?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I am not able to say, but possibly the gentleman from North Dakota can.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the Government does not carry an insurance.

Mr. CULLOP. It is not the policy of the Government to carry insurance?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand it is not.

Mr. HELGESEN. Mr. Chairman, on the 28th day of November last the heating and lighting plant of the Fort Totten Indian School was burned. We were notified by telegraph, and I took the matter up with the Indian Department. The department told me they had sent an engineer out there to look it over and that he would make a report. In the course of time the engineer returned and made his report, and Mr. Abbott sent me the following communication, together with the proposed amendment, which I will now read:

The heating and lighting plant at the Fort Totten Indian School, N. Dak., was destroyed by fire on the morning of November 28, 1912. It is imperative that the item herewith be incorporated in the Indian appropriation bill in order that the school may be provided with heat and light during the coming winter. The appropriation should be made immediately available.

It is only necessary to point out the fact that it is practically impossible for the children and employees to occupy these school buildings without an adequate heating plant, because of the extreme cold climate. The Indian Service is now attempting to heat a portion of the buildings by means of stoves, which are entirely inadequate and are also dangerous because of the probability of fire.

The school plant is without a lighting system and oil lamps are being used, which add to the danger of fire and are wholly inadequate.

The Indian Service has provided a temporary power house, which should be supplemented with a permanent structure at the earliest possible moment.

This is one of the largest schools of the country. It has about 400 pupils. The average attendance is 383 according to the report, and in the cold climate that we have in North Dakota it is utterly impossible to get along with stoves, as they are attempting to do now. There are 34 buildings altogether. This school occupies the site of old Fort Totten and the buildings formerly used as a fort are partly used for this school. There are 20 of these buildings heated by this central heating plant, and without the rebuilding of this plant it would be impossible to conduct the school. A school that is so large that it has an attendance of about 400 it seems to me is entitled to immediate relief in a case of this kind. I do not think it is necessary to go into details in regard to the size of the school.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELGESEN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, of course, knows that this bill will not become a law until the 4th of March next at best, in all probability.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is to be immediately available.

Mr. MANN. But it can not be available until it becomes a law.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We hope it will become a law very soon.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman from Texas does not think there is any likelihood of this bill becoming a law until the 4th of March, does he?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No; and then there will be several months of the school.

Mr. MANN. This is a deficiency item. It does not have any place in this bill at all. If these buildings were burned recently, the department ought to make an estimate for a deficiency appropriation, which might become a law at the early part of this month, if it is reported out by the Committee on Appropriations, which would have jurisdiction. However, I shall not make the point of order. I withdraw the point of order, although it was stupid on the part of somebody in the department in not making a proper estimate in a proper manner, to get the money speedily available. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that the total be changed so as to correspond to the additional item.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it will be so changed.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fulfilling treaties with Pawnees, Oklahoma: For perpetual annuity, to be paid in cash to the Pawnees (article 3, agreement of Nov. 23, 1892), $30,000; for support of 2 manual-labor schools (article 8, treaty of Sept. 24, 1857), $10,000; for pay of 1 farmer, 2 blacksmiths, 1 miller, 1 engineer and apprentices, and 2 teachers (article 4, same treaty), $5,400; for purchase of iron and steel and other necessaries for the shops (article 4, same treaty), $500; for pay of physician and purchase of medicines, $1,200; in all, $47,100.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman a question. I see that you have grouped here certain laborers and made a sum total for the pay of the whole number.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. In what line?

Mr. CULLOP. Lines commencing with line 4, page 21—

1 farmer, 2 blacksmiths, 1 miller, 1 engineer and apprentices, and 2 teachers, $5,400.

Why were not those items and amounts specified for each?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will say to the gentleman that this is a treaty item, fulfilling the treaty, and we followed the language of the treaty.

Mr. CULLOP. And this money must be paid whether the employees are used by them or not?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Until the expiration of the treaty.

Mr. MANN. And, if the gentleman will permit, these people are not actually employed.

Mr. CULLOP. I understand; but I would like to know if when they do not employ persons for these occupations whether or not the money is paid out for that purpose or belongs to the Indians.

Mr. MANN. There is a provision in the bill always providing that if a person is not employed the money shall be used for other purposes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And distributed.

Mr. CULLOP. For other purposes?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It was a general fund, and that was the name of the fund, although it may be applied for other purposes.

Mr. MANN. Of course, they have no use for these people.

Mr. CULLOP. That is what I wanted to know. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

SEC. 18. For expenses of administration of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, Oklahoma, and the compensation of employees, $150,000; Provided, That during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, no moneys shall be expended from the tribal funds belonging to the Five Civilized Tribes without specific appropriation by Congress, except as follows: Equalization of allotments per capita and other payments authorized by law to individual members of the respective tribes, tribal and other Indian schools for the fiscal current year under existing law, salaries and contingent expenses of governors, chiefs, assistant chiefs, secretaries, interpreters, and mining trustees of the tribes for the current fiscal year, and attorneys for said tribes employed under contract approved by the President, under existing law, for the current fiscal year: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to continue the tribal schools of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations for the current fiscal year.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking whether, in line 15, the language reading "for the fiscal current year" is not an error?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is an error. I move that the words be transposed.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to state that this appropriation of $150,000 in my judgment is not sufficient to provide the necessary administration in the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma. The officials in charge of the Five Civilized Tribes estimated for the next fiscal year that $250,000 would be necessary to carry on the work of administering the affairs of the Indians comprising the Five Civilized Tribes. The department, as I recall, only estimated for $200,000. The appropriation last year, I think, was $200,000 or $250,000. In the portion of the bill that provides an appropriation for special agents $50,000 was carried last year with the understanding that it was to be used for the pay of district agents throughout the Five Civilized Tribes. The estimate this year included $50,000, which had been eliminated, so that there is a difference, if the appropriation last year was $250,000, of $100,000. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that one of the most necessary things for us to do is to continue the district agents. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] I am sure will make the same argument that he has made heretofore, that there are employed at Muskogee alone 500 employees, and that there is expended $1,300,000, which I think are the figures which he usually uses. Now, I am going to discuss, perhaps, a little further on, the number of employees at Muskogee, but I want to state now that I do not think it is a question of how many employees there may be, but the question is are there any employees whose services are unnecessary? That ought to be the question and not the number of employees. I find upon referring to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that there are something like 500 employees in that office, and that under that bureau, in all the different branches, there are something like 1,400 or 1,500 employees. That I submit is no argument that there are too many, without something being asserted to show that the force might be reduced without injury to the service. I think this item of $150,000——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that the last of the lands of the Choctaws and Chickasaws have been sold, except some small parcels of asphalt and oil lands?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is not a fact at all.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There is very little left.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Perhaps I had better say what I am going to say now, rather than further on, if the committee will indulge me. I will detain the committee but a short time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I hope the gentleman will admit that some of the Choctaw and Chickasaw lands have been sold. I think all have been sold, although there may be some small remnants, and it may be that some of the Seminole lands have been divided among them.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman—and I hope some of the gentlemen will discuss that feature of it—that of the appropriation of $250,000 estimated for, $50,000 was in the item for the pay of special agents, and that only $15,000 of the amount is to be expended in the administration of the office of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes. The money estimated for, all but $15,000, is to be expended for administering the affairs of individual incompetent Indians, for district agents, the payment of the several employees of the district agents, and the general administration of their affairs, and only $15,000 of the amount is to be used in the office of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes.

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] has repeatedly stated, and stated it only recently, that there were 500 employees in the office at Muskogee alone, and that about $1,300,000 was being expended there annually. I am going to state—and I will say that I have obtained this information from the department, so that it is reliable—that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, there was an average of 62 employees in the office of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes. Their salaries aggregated $69,338.80. The total number of employees on December 26, 1912, including the commissioner, was 51. The total number of employees in the office of the Union Agency June 30, 1912, was 104.

The Union Agency is the general agency that administers the affairs and looks after the noncompetent Indians, and has nothing whatever to do with the commissioner's office, whose business it is to complete the rolls and the allotments and the disposition of the tribal properties.

The salaries at the Union Agency were $118,940, and the field force consisted of 72 persons, as follows: District agency force, 45; oil-field inspection, 3; land appraisers, 10; agricultural work, 12; salaries, $97,400. The Indian police numbered 35, and their salaries aggregated $9,000. The total number of employees December 27, 1912, was as follows: Office, 90; field, 57; Indian police, 25.

Now, I say to the gentleman that if he will figure up the total number of employees at these two offices he will find that the number is very far below 500.

Let us see what the commissioner has done during fiscal years 1911 and 1912—just a few of the things that he has done. During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911, the commissioner sold 11,330 tracts of land, aggregating 630,237 acres, for $4,212,788, and collected on these lands of the purchase price $1,474,247. Those sales were made with the payments running along for one or two or three years, I think, and the gentlemen from Oklahoma, on account of the drought conditions prevailing down there, very properly secured legislation extending the time of payment—the time when this money should be paid—but necessitating, as everyone will see, a great amount of detail work in the computation of interest and the granting of these extensions. For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1912, there were sold 5,099 tracts, aggregating 319,310 acres, for $2,038,023, and collected $1,323,068, and also $50,764 of interest on deferred payments.

The gentlemen from Oklahoma, also looking out for the best interests of their State, as they always do—and I commend them for it—secured legislation providing that the moneys belonging to these Indians should be deposited in local banks in Oklahoma. Gentlemen, think of depositing several million dollars in local banks throughout the State! Think of the work connected with the detail of ascertaining the standing of the banks and the arranging bonds and securities, and so forth, as is required under the regulations, and think of the amount of work that it adds to these officers! There had been deposited in 132 local banks in Oklahoma on June 30, 1912, $3,034,803 of tribal funds, upon which there was collected $52,500 in interest. On December 27 the deposits in local banks amounted to $3,442,506 in 163 banks.

The moneys that I have just referred to were deposited by the commissioner as tribal moneys. The Union Agency also had on deposit in 52 banks on June 30, 1912, Indian moneys aggregating $1,357,993, and the interest collected for the year ended June 30, 1912, amounted to $31,793.12.

Sixteen thousand four hundred and twenty-nine separate tracts have been sold, necessitating a ledger account for each tract, accounting for remittances received, looking after deferred payments, and computing interest thereon until final payments are made. As full payments are made deeds are issued. The lands being scattered and intermingled with allotted lands, computing interest on deferred payments and preparing, recording, and delivering deeds all require much detail work of an exact character.

Mr. Chairman, the Union agent has submitted a statement in which it appears that during the last fiscal year he actually handled over $10,000,000. I submit this is a big showing, and it must necessarily require that a large force be provided in order properly to safeguard and look out for the interests of these Indians.

Mr. Chairman, the district agents employed in the Five Civilized Tribes, according to the reports that have been made, show that they actually saved last year to the individual Indians in Oklahoma about $650,000, as I remember, in requiring guardians to account for moneys that were misappropriated, in obtaining adequate consideration for leases, and other things where the Indians had been defrauded; and in many other particulars, as I say, they actually saved last year about $650,000 and about $550,000 in the year before.

That the force of district agents is not adequate, and that they have not been able to protect these Indians as they should be protected, was made apparent by the Mott report which I brought to the attention of the House recently, showing the condition of guardianship matters in the Creek Nation, where it was shown that about $1,600,000 in the last three or four years had been expended in attorneys' fees, court costs, and guardianship fees in the administration of the affairs of the Indian minors in that particular portion of the Five Civilized Tribes at a cost of about 20 per cent of the amount handled.

It may be said, and I presume will be said, that the district agents have not been diligent or that condition would not have prevailed. It is an absolute impossibility for 10 or 12 district agents in an area as great as the State of Indiana, comprising a large number of counties, something like 60, if I am correct, to be present to look out for each one of these guardianship cases so as to see that the interests of the ward are being properly protected. I say in the utmost good faith that it will be a mistake to reduce this appropriation so that these district agents shall not be continued in the future.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I shall consume only a moment of time. The burden of the complaint of the gentleman from South Dakota, as I understand it, is that the Oklahoma delegation and the Committee on Appropriations have reduced the amount of this appropriation for salaries to a degree that is dangerous. My reply is that of the 101,000 members of the Five Civilized Tribes, most of them are competent, well-educated people, so intermingled and intermarried with the whites that there is scarcely any Indian blood left. And to the end that we may not make any mistake about it, I want, if I may, in a moment or two, to analyze this appropriation of $150,000, and tell this committee what you can do with that amount in the way of employing clerks.

You can employ 1 chief, at $5,000 a year. You can employ 10 assistants, at $2,500 a year; 10 more assistants, at $2,000 a year; 50 clerks, at $1,500 a year; and 25 clerks, at $1,000 a year. That makes up the aggregate of $150,000.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If the gentleman will permit me, is it not a fact that the salaries of the force to which the gentleman has just referred have been largely paid from moneys received by way of a charge for collecting moneys and from other sources.

Mr. FERRIS. I think that is partially true, and I think I may say at the same time that it is done in the face of the Atoka agreement. Nineteen years ago, when the Dawes Commission was established, they promised these people in a solemn treaty that they would not use their funds in administering upon their estates; but as time went along lax methods were acquired, and little items were squeezed into appropriation bills here and there which permitted them to take from the Indian funds money to hire a great quota of clerks. That appropriation and the personnel of those clerks have climbed in a way that no man can justify. The gentleman says he has a letter which states that there are only so many employees here and so many there; but I had on my desk and exhibited here in the general debate 21½ pages of names and salaries, this statement being furnished by the Indian office. There can not be any mythology or mysticism about that. I get my figures from the same source that the gentleman gets his, and I got that list of names and salaries from the Indian commissioner, who is as good an authority on that subject as I know of.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. FERRIS. I am not going to get into any great colloquy about this. The gentleman has a well-defined idea that we ought to hire great quotas or droves of people to supervise the affairs of these Indians. I have a very well-defined idea that we ought to fire nearly every one of them out of there and let these Indians run their own business. I know that the gentleman will conjure figures. I do not mean to say that disrespectfully, but a man who wants to hold his job on a fat salary and with a liberal expense account—and there are 500 of them—can make remarkable figures and can come up here and get gentlemen to present them, which makes them appear very necessary.

Our delegation is very much in earnest about this matter, and we are acting in entire good faith. We believe we are right about it. We feel that the Indian people down there are practically bred out; that there is no longer any real Indian problem there among the great bulk of them. The people of the Five Civilized Tribes have maintained their own government for more than half a century. They have had legislatures and governors; they have passed laws. They have passed laws against intermarriage with negro tribes. They have passed laws on all sorts of propositions that white people would legislate upon. We have now Members of Congress and United States Senators. Our governor, our lieutenant governor, and the speaker of the Oklahoma Legislature are Indian citizens. I want to beg not only the Democrats here, but the Republicans, not to force upon us a lot of employees whom our people do not want. What we want is an end to this oversupervision down there. It has lasted too long already.

The answer to that, as these gentlemen will present it, is that we are trying to strip the State of Oklahoma of the necessary supervision that will keep these Indians from being robbed. That is only a plea to maintain their positions. Quite a startling set of figures was presented here a short time ago by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] with reference to the expense of administering Indian estates in the probate courts of Oklahoma.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Oklahoma be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from Oklahoma be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. I have just one more observation I want to make. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], I am sure, in entire good faith and as ably as it could be done, presented here a short time ago a matter with reference to the minor Indians in our State. I did not, at that time, have full information upon it, and I have not at this time. I can say to the House, though, and I want it to go into the RECORD, that our delegation has not remained silent and inactive about that matter. We have gone to the Interior Department and got these records that were referred to here. We have sent these to our governor. We have asked the governor of our State, and he has agreed to invoke the machinery of the State government, not only to prosecute, but to throw out of office every man who can be found in any way to have mistreated an Indian ward. These figures charged in effect that the administration of Indian estates cost about 20 per cent, while the estates of white children cost about 1.7 per cent for administration.

That is an amazing statement. I can not believe it is true, for to so believe we must conclude the 40 cojudges and the coattorneys, the bar, are all crooked. I am sure such is not true. There is an answer to that. In most cases of the Five Civilized Tribes the Indian children have land, while the white children have none. That is not uniform, but it is almost. Why? Because up until the last few years they could not acquire title to land under any conditions. Up to seven or eight years ago you could not acquire title to a town lot, let alone agricultural land. So the estate was administered upon, almost in toto, for the Indians to hold the real estate, whereas the white estates were a little personal property which does not require any court proceeding or extended court costs.

Now, following that, 96 employees ought to be enough to administer upon a few full-blooded Indians that remain there. The gentleman will reply that the records of the Interior Department will show that there are 35,000 full-blooded Indians. Now, there was a time when it was slippery down there as to whether you should remain on the rolls or remain off the rolls. It was worth $8,000 or $10,000 if you remained on the rolls, and you lost everything if you went off the rolls. An unwritten law went around that if you went on the rolls as a full-blooded Indian you would never be rejected. The result was that a man with one-eighth or one-thirty-second Indian blood, if he could get some tribunal to put him on the rolls as a full-blooded Indian, would go on; and so he sits there with fifteen-sixteenths white blood in his veins—sits there as an incompetent Indian—whereas, as a matter of fact, he is able to hold a seat in Congress, a seat in the Senate, or be at the head of a banking institution, or a lawyer or a doctor, as many are.

Now, the real situation with regard to the Five Civilized Tribes is that the agency ought to be squeezed down to 25,000 or 30,000, an agency something like the Kiowa Agency, to administer on the full-bloods and to let the white Indians alone; and the sooner that can happen the better.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman happen to see a report made by one of the board of Indian commissioners in reference, not to the agency, but as to the condition of the Indians down there as to their ability to transact business?

Mr. FERRIS. I saw that in one of the papers.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how much of it was published in the paper; it is an official document, of course.

Mr. FERRIS. I did see it, and inasmuch as the gentleman alludes to it, and Members may not know what it was, I will say that it comes about in this way. This man the gentleman from Illinois refers to lives in Boston or Philadelphia?

Mr. MANN. I do not know where he lives.

Mr. FERRIS. I think he lives in Philadelphia.

Mr. MANN. All the Indians are not west of the Allegheny Mountains.

Mr. FERRIS. I know they are not; that is very true. I think this gentleman's name is Vaux. I have met Mr. Vaux; he is a delightful gentleman, a pleasant man, and undoubtedly has the best motives and intends to do good things for the Indians. I do not impugn his motive at all, but this is what happens: A man like Mr. Vaux will come from the East to Oklahoma. He wants to see some poor, old, pitiable Indian living out under a bark, and you can find whites worse off than they are; but he wants to see if he can not find some poor, old, ignorant Indian who does not know A from B, and through unfortunate circumstances is reduced to nothing. He finds him; he lives in a hovel, and the old Indian gets out in front of the hovel and pulls his hair down over his face so that he looks like an idiot, and the man gets out his camera and takes the picture, takes it back to New York and the New York Sun, or some other paper, writes up a beautiful story for the Sunday edition to go all over the East. People who know not of Indian questions think all Indians are alike, and that an agent should be detailed to transact all the business of these people, whether competent or incompetent. Such a large amount of supervision renders these Indians dependents and incompetents.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate close on this matter in five minutes.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman will pardon me, I want to read a paragraph or two which will take me more than five minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I will ask that all debate close on the matter in 10 minutes.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, does that carry with it the paragraph and amendments thereto?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There is no amendment pending. I understand that we are discussing the item on a pro forma amendment made by the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I shall object to that, because I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman to offer an amendment; I have no objection to that, and I ask unanimous consent that all debate be closed in 10 minutes on the paragraph.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I anticipate that after this debate has closed it will not be out of order then, if unanimous consent is granted to close debate, to offer as an amendment an independent paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that debate on the paragraph shall expire at the end of 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I understood when the gentleman made the request for unanimous consent that it was not intended that the time desired by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] should be taken from the 10 minutes requested. I will state that I may use about 7 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this controversy respecting the proper method of handling the Five Civilized Tribes is a perennial one. It comes up at least once each year, and lately it has come up once each session. The reason it is perennial must be the fact that it is a difficult proposition. I do not think any Member of the House will question the patriotism, zeal, and ability of the gentlemen from Oklahoma, who are interested in and take an active part in this matter, although some of us may be inclined to differ with them in their conclusions, perhaps in some of the facts, which they state.

Personally I do feel a sympathy with their contention that we should withdraw supervision at the earliest practical time, but what is a practical time and a proper one to withdraw supervision is the distressing feature. I desire to call attention of the committee for a few moments to some work now being performed of a detailed nature at the agency in which are engaged many employees of whom criticism has been urged.

And as I take up this feature I wish to first call attention to the fact that we have had some bitter experiences in the State of Oklahoma, experiences that seem to recur even when we think they have passed away. There has been an attempt, and I think perhaps we can say a successful attempt, to blot out from history what is known as the Creek and Muskogee town-site matter, and yet we must look back upon that as a lesson to guide us in some of the deliberations of the present. I myself think that there is not a case in all Indian history, beginning with Christopher Columbus and coming down to now—and that is going some—that is as black and as bad as the town-site cases in the Creek Nation, about which we hear nothing now, because, as I have indicated, it is pretty nearly a closed chapter. With that lesson added to some of the others, particularly the guardianship and probate-court matters recently discussed by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], some of us feel that there still remains a necessity on the part of the Government to extend its protection and care, and supervise some of the details, over some of the activities and property rights of these people.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. Does not the gentleman think it would be a part of wisdom to draw the agency down to a proposition of handling the really incompetent Indians?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. And let the money and property of the white Indians go?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Does not the gentleman think that $150,000, which provides for 96 employees, ought to be enough?

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman will add enough to continue these district agents for another year, until the probate courts can get straightened around——

Mr. FERRIS. But does not the gentleman think that out of 96 employees 18 of them might serve as district agents, if they were so designated?

Mr. MILLER. Eighteen would be entirely inadequate for the work. This matter of the probate courts only came to public attention two years ago, when the committee, of which I happened to be a member, unearthed some things in the very presence of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], who cooperated with us in every respect, and who I am sure shared our views upon the subject. The probate courts of Oklahoma have not yet become straightened out—purified, as it were—and the public sentiment of the State has not yet been thoroughly aroused and not yet asserted itself in appropriate action, so that the affairs of a large part of the Indians will be honestly and justly handled without governmental supervision. Conditions are improving, but the complete change has not yet come to pass.

I think it is going to work out, but while it is working out I think we ought to still keep up these district agents for another year. However, that I did not intend to speak of. I wish to call the attention of the committee to some of the work that is being done by these agency employees. I have had many people speak to me about the destitution of the Indians in Oklahoma, assuming that they were poverty stricken. As a matter of fact, they are not. Muskogee, the second city in Oklahoma, is the center of a forest, not of oak, not of pine, but of oil wells. Looking abroad from the city you can see 5,000 great derricks. It is one of the most inspiring industrial sights ever unfolded to human gaze.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RODDENBERY). The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. This is but one of the great oil fields in Oklahoma. At Tulsa there is a greater one, and others might be named. Some of the work incident to the administering of the affairs of these Indians becomes apparent when you see the figures connected with handling these oil leases. Nearly all of these oil lands, it will be borne in mind, are Indian lands, owned by private Indians, whose affairs have to be superintended or they would be defrauded. I read now from the report of the commissioner:

One of the greatest oil fields in the world has been developed in the area of the Five Tribes, largely under departmental leases. The production during the past few years has been approximately 40,000,000 barrels per annum. The Union Agency has handled up to the close of the past year 23,721 leases, mostly oil and gas, and on June 30, 1912, had 7,679 individual royalty ledger accounts, 413 restricted Cherokee equalization accounts, 967 land-sale accounts, with balance aggregating a total of $1,135,033.24, distributed in 52 banks located in almost every county in eastern Oklahoma. While this money is passing through the process of supervision the depositories are required to pay interest thereon, and during the year a total of $31,793.12 was collected as interest on these accounts and paid to the Indians. During the year just closed the total collections and total disbursements aggregated over $6,000,000. Including the amount received from the Treasury for transfer to individual accounts or disbursement and balances brought forward from previous year, the grand total of money handled for the fiscal year 1912 was $10,701,624.27. The accounting work is entirely handled in the agency office at Muskogee, the field force being relieved, as far as possible, of all clerical detail, so that they may give their entire time to investigations and the expeditious handling of applications and cases filed with them. The account for the year was made up of 28,786 remittance entries and 71,711 disbursement vouchers. There were 412,944 pieces of mail handled by the Muskogee office during the year.

The gentleman from Oklahoma says there is a large number of employees. It is a large job, it is a job of innumerable details, big in dollars, vast in detail, and if it is to be properly handled at all a requisite number of competent employees must be employed.

It is not simply a question of lands, either grazing or farming, but it is a great mineral field, cut up into small tracts, with vast numbers of leases. Many of the Indians are incompetent, and most of them require some supervision; and while this vast task remains in its present condition I for one feel that we should give to the service a reasonable sum to employ a reasonable number of employees. The gentleman seeks to cut the present appropriation. To-day there are employed at this agency 90 office men, 57 field men, and 25 Indian police. In addition there are 51 in the commissioner's office.

Mr. FERRIS rose.

Mr. MILLER. Oh, I know the gentleman has five hundred and something. I do not know the names that are there, but I have a certified statement from the agent himself, and I am sure the gentleman will admit that it is true.

Mr. FERRIS. I know the gentleman does not care to mislead. I hold in my hand here 21½ pages of a closely written document, giving the names, salaries, and officers, that was furnished to me by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. MILLER. Does it contain the teachers of all the schools down there?

Mr. FERRIS. Probably it does.

Mr. MILLER. I am sure that the gentleman in this controversy would not ask that those teachers be included?

Mr. FERRIS. I am not sure they are. If there are any included, there is but a small number of them.

Mr. MILLER. I do not think the number is very small, in view of the next paragraph in the bill, which calls for $300,000 for these schools.

Mr. FERRIS. I think it is.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Has not the debate ended on the paragraph?

Mr. CARTER. I move to strike out the last two words, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There was an understanding that the debate was to close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that that request was presented, but withdrawn.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I desire to renew the request that all debate on this paragraph be closed in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph close in two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I shall hardly need the two minutes. There has been repeatedly stated on the floor of this House the many wonderful things the famous Dawes Commission and the Union Agency have done in Oklahoma. The Dawes Commission came there in 1893 and this is 1913; it has operated for 20 years, and I dare say it has consumed from Federal Treasury and tribal funds combined not less than $1,000,000 per annum, which would aggregate $20,000,000, and which the gentleman must admit is out of all proportion to the amount of work accomplished. Much has also been said about the extravagance of probate courts in handling Indian probate matters, but I doubt very seriously if the percentage of cost in probate proceedings has equaled that consumed by the Indian Bureau in Oklahoma for the settlement of the tribal estate.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now, Mr. Chairman, as a new paragraph, after line 23, on page 22, I offer an amendment, that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of salaries of employees and other expenses of advertisement and sale in connection with the disposition of unallotted lands and other tribal property belonging to any of the Five Civilized Tribes, to be paid from the proceeds of such sales when authorized by the Secretary of the Interior as provided by the act approved March 3, 1911, not exceeding $25,000, reimbursable from proceeds of sales.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order against the amendment. It is new legislation and is not germane to the paragraph in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS). The Chair will hear the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Why, Mr. Chairman, there is not any question about it, if the Chair will look at the law. I did not suppose that anybody would make a point of order against the amendment. In 1911 the gentlemen from Oklahoma were solicitous that there be legislation permitting the deposit of money belonging to these Indians in the local banks in Oklahoma, and this act was passed. The net proceeds from the sales of surplus and unallotted lands and other tribal property, belonging to any of the Five Civilized Tribes, after deducting the necessary expense of advertising and sale, may be deposited in the national or State banks of Oklahoma, and so forth. The comptroller held that under that language they could not deduct from the proceeds the cost of sale, the advertising, and so forth, and that it was necessary to have this legislation in order to carry out the provisions of that act, and in the current appropriation act for this year, and also last year, this language was carried in order that the amount might be deducted as the act of 1911 contemplated.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman send up the law? Mooted questions like this depend entirely on the law which furnishes the authority. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] desire to say anything on the point of order?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It is identical with the current law, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Identical with the language carried in the last bill?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Just exactly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not think it would follow if it had been in the last bill it would be germane to this bill or would not be new legislation.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Not at all.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It might have been subject to the point of order last year, and the point might not have been made. I understand the point to be now that there is no law authorizing this to be paid out of Indian funds. That is surely subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. As I recall the item in the current law it has not a fixed amount at all.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Not exceeding $25,000.

Mr. MANN. I think it says not exceeding 10 per cent of the receipts.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is another item.

Mr. CARTER. That is for the collection of rents.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Twenty-five thousand dollars is to be deducted from the proceeds of the sale of unallotted lands—not exceeding $25,000; and I will say to the gentleman that the act of 1911, which provided that these moneys should be deposited in banks of Oklahoma, contemplated that the expenses incident to collecting them—the sale and property—should be deducted, because the law reads the net proceeds shall be deducted.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to read the amendment. I understand the amendment is in the exact language of the law of last year, and I maintain that the provision in that act itself was subject to a point of order. This is the language:

For payment of salaries of employees and other expenses of advertisement of sale in connection with the disposition of the unallotted lands and other tribal property belonging to any of the Five Civilized Tribes, to be paid from the proceeds of such sales when authorized by the Secretary of the Interior as provided by the act approved March 3, 1911, not exceeding $25,000, reimbursable from the proceeds of sale.

That, I think, makes it clearly subject to a point of order, because, as I understand it, there was no law before that which took from the Indians the money to make them reimburse these payments. If it had been in order for one year, then I will state that it would not have been in order for the next year, because these acts are only annual and run only for the terms covered by the acts.

Mr. FERRIS. And if the gentleman will permit, I may say, in addition to what the chairman has stated, that the appropriation of $25,000, reimbursable, was to do a specific task—that is, to sell the unallotted lands of the Five Civilized Tribes. They have sold the unallotted lands of the Five Civilized Tribes, and now they come in and offer an amendment, in identical language, to do the very thing that has already been done.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, that has nothing to do with the point of order.

Mr. FERRIS. I think it has. I think if an appropriation is made to-day in this current bill to do a specific thing during the following fiscal year, and that thing is done, even though it be in order that year, it would not be in order in each succeeding year and indefinitely; and the fact that that was in order last year, to do a specific task that was done this year, does not make it in order in a succeeding year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask a question of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, practically this same question came up in the Sixty-first Congress. There was an item in the Indian appropriation bill as it came from the committee providing for the payment of certain matters out of Indian funds, such as this. A point of order was made against the provision by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DAVENPORT], and upon that point of order the paragraph was ruled out. I have been trying to get the text of the debate at that time, but have not succeeded as yet. I hope to have it in a few moments, and ask the Chair to reserve his ruling until we see what the record discloses.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from South Dakota a question. Of course, there is a question back of this of authority to make this payment. The Chair is referred to page 14, which seems to provide that the net receipts from the sale of the surplus of unallotted lands and other tribal property, after deducting the necessary expenses of advertisement and sale, and so forth, may be deposited in the national or State banks, and then follow certain provisions in relation to their disposition. Now, does the gentleman find in that authority to appropriate $25,000 for the payment of salaries of employees?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the $25,000, if I remember exactly the wording of the provision, is a mere limitation. The appropriation is that there shall be expended for the expenses of advertising, and so forth, in connection with the sale of unallotted lands, not exceeding $25,000; but I may be mistaken.

Mr. MANN. That is it; not exceeding $25,000.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, if we have by law enacted legislation that we will do a certain thing, I presume that it is necessary to make an appropriation to execute the law. The only point that I can see in the point of order made by the gentleman would be that to deduct the expense from the proceeds is contrary to some existing treaty with the Indians.

Mr. CARTER. That is true, too.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, there is absolutely no treaty and no agreement that requires the United States to go into the business of depositing money belonging to these Indians in the banks of Oklahoma and collecting interest thereon, and there is nothing in the law that contemplated that the United States would be selling lands, as land has been sold in Oklahoma, on time payments of 25 per cent annually, and a great many other things that we are doing in Oklahoma. And when that provision that the Chair now has before him was considered as finally enacted into law it was done after a careful examination of existing treaties and agreements with the Indians, and nothing could be found in conflict with our requiring of these Indians that they pay the expenses of this unusual business which we are carrying on for their benefit.

The gentlemen from Oklahoma are not only trying to drive out the district agents who supervise and look after the affairs of the individual restricted Indians, but they also propose to appropriate money from the Federal Treasury to pay the expense of administering laws that have been placed upon the statute books for the benefit of the people in Oklahoma, the local banks. For instance, the depositing of $5,000,000 or $4,000,000 in 200 banks and collecting the interest thereon is something of an undertaking. We are going to pay the interest to the Indians, and then the United States is going to pay the expense of the administration. I say to the gentleman that that is contrary of the policy that prevails, so far as the Committee on Indian Affairs is concerned, on both sides of the House, as to dealing with the Indians generally.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment contemplates the payment of salaries of employees—the amendment at the desk.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It says "necessary employees," does it not?

The CHAIRMAN. The word "necessary" is not used. It contemplates the payment of salaries. Now, are these employees necessary in connection with the advertisement and sale of these unallotted lands?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. But for this provision in the amendment, these officials would not be paid for services rendered in connection with the unallotted lands?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the position of the gentlemen from Oklahoma, it is that they will be paid out of the appropriation of $150,000 that is now used for other purposes largely.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that true as a matter of fact?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think it is.

Mr. FERRIS. These lands have been sold four times in the last four years. That is, they have been offered for sale. Every year they go around and offer them, but do not sell them. This year they sold nearly all of them, and there is no necessity for offering them again next year. That is the fact. I understand that goes to the merits, but the gentleman asked for information.

Mr. CARTER. They have so stated. The Commissioner of the Five Civilized Tribes stated publicly that there would be no more sales of these lands in the future.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If the merits have any bearing upon the ruling of the Chair on the point of order——

Mr. CARTER. I was answering the gentleman's statement about the matter, that is all. I think it bears right on the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is simply trying to get at the facts. The principle is clear enough, but the difficulty is to get at the facts about the parliamentary situation.

Mr. CARTER. In the first session of the Sixtieth Congress the following paragraph was read:

For clerical work and labor connected with the leasing of Creek and Cherokee lands, for mineral and other purposes, and the leasing of lands of full-blood Indians under the act of April 26, 1906, $40,000: Provided, That the sum so expended shall be reimbursable out of the proceeds of such leases, and shall be equitably apportioned by the Secretary of the Interior from the moneys collected from such leases.

To that provision the following point of order was made:

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to the proviso beginning in line 23 and extending to the end of line 26 on the ground that it is new legislation and contains a change of existing law and the treaty with the tribes. I make it as to the entire proviso.

There was considerable discussion, covering several pages of the RECORD, after which the Chair finally ruled in the following manner:

Well, the Chair is ready to rule; and though he is very loath himself to so rule, yet, after consultation with a gentleman who is an excellent authority and who seems to be very clear, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that at that time the act of 1911 had not been passed.

Mr. CARTER. The act of 1912 was only for 12 months, was it not?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I am speaking of the paragraph in the Indian appropriation bill for 1911 which was general in its character and which provided that the net amount received from the sale of lands should be deposited in the local banks after deducting the expense of sale and advertising. Now, the gentleman from Oklahoma assisted in obtaining that legislation, and it was granted upon the representation that the expense of the sale and advertising would be deducted from the proceeds.

Mr. CARTER. My recollection is that that was an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill put on in the Senate and adopted in conference.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. No; it was inserted in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Would the word "salaries" in the amendment be considered as being limited exclusively to compensation for work immediately connected with the sales, or would it have a broader application?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I have not the item. I have sent to the desk the copy that I had.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that the authority of the act cited which provides for depositing in certain banks the net receipts from the sales of surplus and unallotted lands, less the necessary expense of advertising and sale, is hardly authority to support the amendment under consideration relating to the salaries of employees and other things. The Chair is not very well satisfied in his own mind about this ruling, because it is difficult for him to get at all the provisions of law back of the amendment, and which are supposed to justify it. On the whole, however, though with some hesitation, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer as another independent paragraph what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as a separate paragraph, after line 23, the following:

"For expenses incident to and in connection with collection of rents of unallotted lands and tribal buildings such amount as may be necessary: Provided, That such an expenditure shall not exceed in the aggregate 10 per cent of the amount collected."

Mr. FERRIS. I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, it is possible that this item is subject to a point of order. I will say, however, that it has been the law in two or three of the annual appropriation bills, including the one for the current fiscal year. As I have already stated, we are doing a very large amount of work in Oklahoma, and much that never was contemplated by the original treaty made with the Indians when we undertook to make a roll and to allot the lands.

The gentleman has stated that the unallotted lands have already been sold. I will state that there are at present 100,000 acres of unallotted lands undisposed of. There are 1,300,000 acres of timberlands that have not been disposed of. There are something like 20,000 accounts pending, where from 75 to 25 per cent of the purchase price which was to be paid for the unallotted lands, aggregating several million dollars, has not been collected. Evidently there must be an administrative force in the Five Civilized Tribes to attend to the details pertaining to the collection of this large amount of money; and, as I stated a while ago, owing to the diligence of our friends from Oklahoma, the time for the making of these payments was extended. The rate of interest is, I think, 6 per cent, and therefore every time there is a payment made there has to be a computation to ascertain the amount of interest. When payment is made finally then there has to be the proving, and the issuance of the deed, and a great amount of work in connection therewith.

I want to call the attention of the committee—and I am very glad gentlemen have made these points of order—to the fact that, so far as Oklahoma is concerned, the Federal Treasury will bear the expense of administering the affairs of the Indians. But in every other part of the country wherever it is possible to do so and wherever the Indians have any money, to say nothing of an estate that amounts to forty or sixty million dollars, in that State the expense of administering the affairs must be borne by the Federal Government.

I say it is inconsistent, and I am surprised that our friends from Oklahoma that have secured the things I have referred to when it was distinctly provided, that the expense of sale and collection at the time was to be deducted from the proceeds, that they now come in and raise the point of order in order that the money may be paid from the Treasury.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman will pardon me, I want to state some figures. Oklahoma has about 117,000 Indians within her borders. There are 300,000 Indians in the entire United States. There goes to Oklahoma $460,230; Arizona and New Mexico, $738,000; California, $21,250; Minnesota, $213,175; and to South Dakota, the gentleman's own State, $646,500, of which the two main items aggregate some $500,000, which are absolute gratuities.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. What is that statement—what did the gentleman say goes to South Dakota?

Mr. FERRIS. I say there are two items aggregating $507,000 that are gratuities by which the gentleman is bound by no treaties.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Oh, the gentleman is not familiar with the treaties or he would not say that.

Mr. FERRIS. I think I am quite familiar with them. There goes to Oregon $233,736. Mr. Chairman, I will state that there has been so much muckraking by people who know not the facts in this matter that they are hard to understand. Our State maintains more than one-third of the Indians. We have been the dumping ground of the Indians in that State for the last 50 years, and to have people come here when items are reimbursable and make these statements is too much, and we can endure it no longer. Nearly two-thirds of the Indians in the United States are in our State, and the small sum of $460,000 goes to that State and most of it on the treaty items.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman said a moment ago that most of the Indians in his State, or a good many of them, were holding public office, one was the governor, and very properly pointed to the fact that we have one of the civilized tribes, an honored and distinguished Member of this House, and from what the gentleman has heretofore said I am surprised that he would get up here and say that any money was necessary to be expended on the Indians in Oklahoma.

What I am pointing out, Mr. Chairman, is the fact that the Indians have a vast estate, that they have very large sums of money in the Treasury, and that we are doing in Oklahoma what was never contemplated when the agreement was made, and that there was no obligation on the part of the Government to do the things we are doing. We were not required to put money in the banks of Oklahoma and loan it out at 4, 5, and 6 per cent, as we are doing, and pay the interest to the Indians. We did not undertake to rent a lot of unallotted lands and collect hundreds of thousands of dollars' annual rent for the benefit of the Indians. There are a great many other things we do, and I am surprised that the gentleman should raise any question that the actual expenses of administering the matters should be deducted from the proceeds.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly. I want to say one thing more before the gentleman puts his question. The gentleman says that there has been $20,000,000 expended by the Dawes Commission. The gentleman knows, if he will stop to think, that no such sum of money has been expended by the Dawes Commission.

Mr. CARTER. I do not know it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The expense of enrolling and allotting to the members of the Five Civilized Tribes per capita is lower than the expense of allotment and enrollment of any other tribe of Indians in the United States. When the gentleman says that $20,000,000 has been expended he includes moneys that are expended for tribal expenses, moneys for education, and other things which the bill provides may be expended. He raises no question as to that, and instead of a million dollars there has been something like three or four hundred thousand dollars expended annually for administration purposes.

Mr. CARTER. If the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] does not know that a million dollars or more per annum was spent for several years in Oklahoma for purely administrative purposes, then he has not kept very close tab on the work of the Dawes Commission. To be sure, they may not have spent to exceed that amount per year for all these 20 years, but my statement was to the effect that my belief was that the expenses of maintaining this commission in its dilatory closing of tribal affairs would average about $1,000,000 per annum.

To be sure, a part of this may have been spent for schools, a part may have been spent for tribal officers, a part may have been spent for the sale of the unallotted lands, a part was spent for the sale of town sites and collection of tribal revenues, but all spent either for or by the officials under the direct supervision of the Indian Bureau. But, Mr. Chairman, I verily believe that if the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] would take the trouble to go over the records and analyze the different appropriations he would find that almost, if not quite, $20,000,000 has been used, exclusive of schools.

That, however, was not the question I had expected to address my remarks to. I wanted to discuss these treaty provisions in regard to Oklahoma about which the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] had much to say.

The gentleman lays great stress on the fact that our treaties did not provide for the Federal Government paying the expenses of the sales of land and the collection of rents, and because the treaties did not specifically set forth that these expenses should be paid by the Government he argues that the very statement providing for their doing carries with it an implied appropriation for the accomplishment of the work.

Let us see under what conditions these treaties were made. When the Dawes Commission came to Indian Territory it found the Five Civilized Tribes themselves with a regularly organized constitutional form of government, having officials for the performance of the many functions which the Department of the Interior has since arrogated to its own officials.

The making of the treaties provided for a change of conditions and for the winding up of tribal affairs. They provided for the making of the rolls, the allotments of land, and the sale of the town sites, and specifically set forth that these expenses should be borne by the Federal Government. They provided for the appraisement of land for allotment purposes, for the collection of the coal and asphalt royalties, and for the sale of the coal and asphalt lands, with a special provision that these expenses should be borne by the tribes. Nothing whatever was said as to who should bear the expenses for the sale of the unallotted lands, or for the collection of revenue from other than the coal and asphalt royalties. So I can not see by what distortion of construction the conclusion can be reached that there is an implied authorization in our treaties for the payment of these expenses out of tribal funds.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think the gentleman will admit that we have done a great many things in Oklahoma that were not contemplated at the time the treaty was made, and that the original agreement, the treaty, only contemplated that the Government would make enrollment and allotment of the land. That was the substance of what was contemplated?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, no; the sale of unallotted lands, sale of town sites, collection of coal and asphalt royalties, sale of mineral lands, tribal buildings, and all these other things were provided for by the treaties.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. But we have done a great many things that the treaty did not contemplate.

Mr. CARTER. Yes; that is true; but that does not relieve us of the responsibility of our obligations.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And for the benefit and advantage of the Indians.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon the point of order?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I offer as a new paragraph the following amendment, to be inserted at the end of line 23.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add, after line 23, page 22, as a new paragraph, the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to receive, at any time within six months after the passage of this act, the application of any person for enrollment to the rights of a citizen and member of the Choctaw-Chickasaw Tribe of Indians claiming an interest in the lands and funds of the Choctaw-Chickasaw Tribe by reason of being a descendant of a member of the Choctaw Tribe who received, or was entitled to receive, lands under the terms of article 14 of the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek under date of September 27, 1830.

"That the Secretary of the Interior shall be vested with the power to determine the rights of said claimants upon such evidence as may be produced by the applicant, without regard to any judgment or decision heretofore rendered by any court or commission to the Five Civilized Tribes or the Department of the Interior, and without regard to any condition or disability heretofore imposed by any act of Congress: Provided, That any relevant evidence admissible either in actions at law or in equity in the courts of the United States shall be received by the Secretary of the Interior as evidence in determining the rights of said applicants: Provided further, That any testimony received as evidence and appearing in the record in the case of the Choctaw Nation v. The United States, No. 12442, in the Court of Claims, and decided in the United States Supreme Court on November 15, 1886, may, if relevant, be received in evidence.

"That all applicants under this act may be represented by such attorneys as each individual may select, and the fee of such attorney may be fixed in accordance with any contract now or hereafter made between said applicant and said attorney, and that such contract shall govern the amount of such fee: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may limit the percentage of compensation in each case, and that the said contract shall be enforcible for no greater sum than that which may be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior.

"That the Secretary of the Interior shall have prepared and made a schedule or roll of all persons entitled under the provisions of this act, within eight months after its passage, and shall, within said eight months, award them the full rights of citizens and members of the Choctaw-Chickasaw Tribe: Provided, That those enrolled under this act shall not be entitled to nor receive any part of the Choctaw annuities existing as of the date of September 27, 1830.

"That in the event there shall not be sufficient land to make allotments to such persons as may be enrolled under this act to equalize them with the allotments heretofore granted to those already upon the rolls of said tribe, there shall be placed to the credit of each person who does not receive allotments, and paid to such person a sum of money equal to double the appraised value of 320 acres of the average allotable land of the Choctaw-Chickasaw Tribe, according to the relative appraisement heretofore made, in lieu of said allotments of land.

"That there shall be paid to each person who enrolls under the provisions of this act such a sum of money out of the funds of the tribe as will equalize said person with the persons now upon the rolls for all distributions of money made to citizens and members of said joint tribe since 1893: Provided, That those enrolled under the provisions of this act shall not be entitled to nor receive any part of the Choctaw annuity existing under date of September 27, 1830, aforesaid: Provided further, That this act shall not apply to persons born since March 4, 1907.

"That applications for minors may be made by either parent, or if neither parent is living, by guardian. Applications for insane persons, or those confined in other public institutions, may be made by curators. Depositions may be taken in support of said applications in any place in the United States upon notice to theAttorney General and the Secretary of the Interior, and the procedure as to notice and taking of depositions shall be as in ordinary cases before the United States courts. The expense of taking depositions on the part of claimants shall be paid by the applicants in the first instance, but shall be taxed as costs in each case where the applicant is successful, and said costs shall be charged to the funds of said tribe in the United States Treasury.

"That the rights of all persons claiming citizenship or any rights in the Choctaw-Chickasaw Tribe, under or by reason of the treaty of 1830, who fail to make application to the Secretary of the Interior, under this act, within six months after the passage of this act shall be forever barred.

"That the tribal organization in the Choctaw-Chickasaw Tribe is hereby abolished, and the title to all tribal lands and moneys yet undistributed are declared to be vested in the United States, as trustee for those entitled to the same under the laws and treaties of the United States; and such moneys as may come into the Treasury of the United States as trustee for said tribe, or which are now held by the United States as trustee for said tribe, shall not be distributed among the members of said tribe within eight months after the passage of this act."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of saving time, I now make the point of order against the amendment. I am quite willing that the amendment shall be inserted into the record.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will reserve this point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas make the point of order?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I had expected to make the point of order as soon as the reading of the amendment was finished. If the gentleman from Mississippi desires to proceed, however, I shall reserve the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I concede the point of order, if insisted upon, to be well taken. I was in hopes that the gentleman's high sense of justice and fairness would control him in this matter and that he would allow the amendment to be voted upon.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman very much for his compliment, but my high sense of justice and fairness compels me to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

The sum of $300,000, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, in aid of the common schools in the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole Nations in Oklahoma, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914: Provided, That this appropriation shall not be subject to the limitation in section 1 of this act limiting the expenditure of money to educate children of less than one-fourth Indian blood.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order to this paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman may as well make the point of order.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not make the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the point of order for the time being, unless my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], desires to make the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I supposed that the desire was to get through with this bill to-night.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I merely want about 15 minutes to discuss this matter.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some time fixed when we shall close debate upon this section. I therefore move——

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman can not move to close debate when a point of order is pending. The gentleman from Oklahoma, I understand, desires 15 minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is a very good way to expedite business here to permit points of order to be discussed for so long a time.

The CHAIRMAN. It is within the province of any Member to call for the ruling at any time.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I have so far not taken up very much of the time of the committee. This is an important provision to my State, and I would like to have at least 15 minutes in which to discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma make that request.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I believe I measure my words with conservatism and deliberation when I say that never was a State brought into this Union under such unfavorable conditions from the standpoint of financial responsibility and meager tax values as the struggling new Commonwealth which I have the honor in part to represent.

I ask this committee to bear with me in patience, for I bring a message from more than 300,000 helpless, innocent, ambitious American children—American children, let me repeat; blood of your blood and bone of your bone—and they represent the offspring of as noble and worthy pioneers as have ever gone into the wilderness and hewn an empire from the primeval forests of America.

The State of Oklahoma, as most of you know, was made up of what might be called two separate and distinct dependencies—old Oklahoma and Indian Territory—each about equal in area. Indian Territory, the eastern half of the State, consisting of a little less than 20,000,000 acres, and Oklahoma, the western half, exceeding that acreage by a small figure. The population of the State was 1,470,000 shortly before admission, about 120,000 of these being American Indians.

I speak to you to-day in behalf of the eastern half or Indian Territory side of the State.

Indian Territory was really a misnomer, for it was never in fact a Territory. It had no real form of government, no executive or legislative tribunals whatever save the parent Government at Washington. In fact, our only semblance of any form of organized government was the Federal courts which had been established for several years. We had no schools for the white child, no schoolhouses, no improved roads, no bridges, no courthouses, no jails—in fact, no improvements of any public character whatever. So the financial responsibility which Congress imposed upon the people of the eastern half of Oklahoma was that of building a Commonwealth for the more than 700,000 people who inhabited the Indian Territory side of the State, and building it from the grass roots without any digested plans and specifications and without sufficient material, as I will attempt to show.

Now, let us invoice the resources you placed at our command for the accomplishment of this Herculean task; let us see what tools you gave us to work with.

I have told you that the million and a half population of our State included 120,000 Indians, which is more than one-third of all the Indian population of the United States. One hundred and one thousand of these Indians lived on the eastern side, and comprise the Five Civilized Tribes.

Every foot of the 20,000,000 acres of land on the eastern side of Oklahoma, save a few thousand acres of town site, was owned by these Five Civilized Tribes. By the Atoka agreement, approved by Congress on June 28, 1898, and supplemental agreement of July 1, 1902, and other treaties of contemporaneous dates, the Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes had been guaranteed by the Federal Government that none of these lands should become taxable, under various reservations, as follows: Some were made nontaxable for 21 years, or as long as the title to same remained in the original allottee, others for 21 years without conditions, while still others were exempted from taxation in perpetuity regardless of transfer or alienation.

Now, if this was the end of the record and Oklahoma had accepted statehood in the full knowledge of these facts, then we might not now with good grace and in good faith come back to the parent Government and ask even this small modicum of relief.

But this is by no means the end of the story. The enabling act under which Oklahoma became a State was passed, as I remember, by the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress. But along about the same time—on April 26, 1906—there was passed by Congress what was commonly known as the Curtis Act, entitled "An act to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes." This act provided for the taxation of the lands of the Five Civilized Tribes upon certain conditions. The provision dealing with this subject is found in the proviso at the end of secton 19 in the following language:

Provided further, That all lands upon which restrictions are removed shall be subject to taxation, and the other lands shall be exempt from taxation so long as the title remains in the original allottee.

This Federal statute, providing for the taxation of the lands of the Five Civilized Tribes, had been on the statute books for more than 18 months when our constitution was adopted, and every man who thought of the matter of taxation at all when he voted on the constitution felt confident that this act of Congress making these lands taxable, and passed almost two years before statehood, was the law of the land and would prevail.

In accordance with this belief, when the Oklahoma delegation came to Congress, Congress was placed in full information of our deplorable condition and prevailed upon to remove restrictions on about one-half of this 20,000,000 acres of land in order that we might have sufficient taxable values to build up our State institutions and maintain our State government, and our State proceeded with the collection of the taxes.

Since it appeared that we would have sufficient taxable property on the eastern side of our State to maintain our State government and justify the building of necessary State institutions, our people proceeded to float bonds for the building of county courthouses, county jails, public schools, public roads, bridges, and other internal improvements. These bonds have already been issued, are now outstanding, and payment both as to interest and principal must be met in some manner or the credit of the eastern side of the State becomes utterly worthless.

But the Indian of the Five Civilized Tribes showed that he is not so much of an incompetent as some of our friends here would have you believe. Poor Lo emulated the example of his paleface brother. He proceeded to make perfectly good as a full-fledged American citizen by resisting the taxation of his property. These Indians simply asserted the right of nontaxation of their lands, guaranteed to them by their several agreements, by suing out an injunction against the tax officials of Oklahoma. These suits came up through the regular channels of our judiciary to the Supreme Court of the United States, and this high court rendered a decision to the effect that the several agreements made with the Indians were the result of mutual considerations and concessions on both sides, and that thereby the guaranty of nontaxation of Indian lands had come to be a vested right, sufficient to exempt same from taxation, and that those provisions of the acts of April 26, 1906, and May 27, 1908, seeking to make these lands taxable were null and void, thereby leaving the entire east side of our State high and dry, bereft completely of any taxable values, so far as land is concerned.

To make a long story short, you have imposed upon the people of Oklahoma the responsibility of building an empire, and have taken from them the material and tools with which to construct it. You brought us into statehood under a written contract that all Indian lands would be taxable, as long as restrictions were removed, but the courts now hold that these lands can not be taxed, even if the restrictions are removed.

Gentlemen may contend that other States having Indian lands do not receive such gratuities from Congress, but we answer that their cases are not parallel with ours. I repeat, no State in this Union labors under such tax-exemption handicaps as the State of Oklahoma; no other State in this Union has practically one-half of its land area exempt from taxtion; no other State in the Union has over 80 per cent of the land values of the majority of its counties withdrawn from the tax rolls.

And here is another very important distinction: In all other States Indian lands become taxable as soon as the restrictions are removed, but the lands of the Five Civilized Tribes do not. Some of them do not become taxable until sold, and others will never become taxable under any kind of circumstances whatever.

It is true that a small portion of these lands has been sold, but I doubt if the combined sales of both allotted and unallotted lands during the 14 years in which the Dawes Commission has been attempting to settle our affairs will aggregate as much as 4,000,000 acres, and some of that is still nontaxable. This would leave no less than 16,000,000 acres, not less than 80 per cent of all of 40 counties on the east side of the State, nontaxable.

These 16,000,000 acres consist of agricultural, coal, oil, gas, and grazing lands, and their aggregate valuation would probably reach $500,000,000, all of which is withdrawn from taxation.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, ours is a young State, with not so much personal property and valuable improvements as older States; so, like all new countries, our lands represent the principal assets of any value.

I would not undertake offhand to say the specific proportion of values this $500,000,000 worth of property really represents, but it is a stupendous amount to be withdrawn from the taxation of any State, and I dare say would seriously cripple the taxable values even of as wealthy a State as that which the distinguished gentleman reserving this point of order so ably represents on this floor. So I appeal to the good judgment of the gentleman. I implore the gentlemen of this committee not to inflict longer this unjust burden upon our people. Especially do I beseech the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], who honors one of the wealthiest States of this Union by his presence here, to call to his aid all his powers of generosity and graciousness, to muster his full measure of the milk of human kindness, and do simple justice to a struggling young sister State of this Republic by withdrawing his point of order and granting this small modicum of relief.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. Is this not the second attempt to appropriate $300,000 for this purpose? I mean by that, was not the last bill the first time that this sum was carried for the purpose provided in the bill?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, no; the first time that this amount was carried in the bill was in 1904.

Mr. FOWLER. Has it been carried since 1904?

Mr. CARTER. It was carried right along until 1910, the first session of the Sixty-first Congress, and was then dropped. It was dropped at that time because we supposed that these lands would become taxable under the acts of April 26, 1906, and May 27, 1908. That appropriation was dropped prior to the time of the decision of the Supreme Court setting forth that the lands would not become taxable, even when restrictions were removed.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there no provision whatever for the education of these Indians other than this $300,000?

Mr. CARTER. The Indians have some separate schools, Mr. Chairman, at which about probably one-fourth of their scholastic population is being educated; not quite one-fourth, I would judge.

Mr. FOWLER. Is this sum intended to take care of the three-fourths?

Mr. CARTER. This sum, as indicated by the paragraph, is intended to take the place of the money that the State has been deprived of by the nontaxation of these 16,000,000 acres of Indian lands in Oklahoma; and I will say further to the gentleman that the Indian child has the same school privilege in Oklahoma as any other person, because he is a full-fledged citizen of the United States and of the State of Oklahoma.

Mr. FOWLER. Do they not have free schools there the same as the whites?

Mr. CARTER. We have, but we are not able to maintain them at some places for a very great length of time during the year on account of our meager taxable assets.

Mr. FOWLER. How long do you maintain the free-school system?

Mr. CARTER. We maintain them in the country districts, I would say, from three to seven months.

Mr. FULLER. On an average of how many months?

Mr. CARTER. Of course, the gentleman is getting me into pretty deep water now. I would not like to attempt a statement like that offhand without making some figures. In some neighborhoods we have been practically unable to operate schools except by these funds provided by this paragraph, and then we have been able to run them only from three to five months.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not a fact that in many States of the Union there are counties which do not run the schools for the whites more than five or six months in a year?

Mr. CARTER. Without this appropriation I doubt if we would be able to run three months in some of our school districts.

Mr. FOWLER. Is this intended to extend the free school system over the three or four months that you say?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, yes; that is what it is used for.

Mr. FOWLER. To pay teachers and to provide for the extension of the schools?

Mr. CARTER. That is the purpose.

Mr. FOWLER. How long will it give these Indians a school per annum? How many months?

Mr. CARTER. Again, I would not say, specifically, as to that. It is a very small amount, but it would at least extend the schools two or three months where we are short on taxable values.

Mr. FOWLER. Do you think this sum ought to go out of this bill?

Mr. CARTER. I certainly do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. How much did the department estimate?

Mr. CARTER. My eyes do not fall on the figures right now, but I think it was $300,000.

Mr. MILLER. I am quite sure the gentleman is mistaken. I do not think the department estimate is that at all. I do not find it at all.

Mr. CARTER. I have two estimates in my hands.

Mr. MILLER. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I think they are letters.

Mr. CARTER. They are letters—justifications.

Mr. MILLER. This is not estimated for by the department.

Mr. CARTER. It is not estimated for. It was not estimated for to begin with, but it was justified by the department since then and before it was favorably acted on by the committee.

Mr. MANN. The estimate came from the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. CARTER. This is a letter from the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MILLER. The purpose of my inquiry is to ascertain if this expenditure was an item in a comprehensive scheme of education in Oklahoma and was in the department's estimate. I have not been able to find any estimate.

Mr. CARTER. I think the department worked it out pretty thoroughly in 1904, when it was first put in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] has expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CARTER. In 1904 this matter came up from the department, and I think extended hearings were had before the Committee on Indian Affairs, but I am informed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] that no record was kept of those hearings. I have searched very diligently for them and have not been able to find them. In 1905, 1906, 1907, 1908, and 1909 it was estimated for. And at the next session, I think, although I will not be sure about that, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] was then chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs and can tell whether there was an estimate. And his bill carried $75,000, although in different language from that which had been used in the past. At that time it was supposed that the Indian lands would become taxable as soon as restrictions were removed or, at the most, when sold, but since then the Supreme Court has held that some of the lands would not become taxable when restrictions were removed and others would not be taxable even when transferred—nontaxable in perpetuity. We thought last year it would be necessary—in fact, we found it extremely necessary—to restore the item of $300,000, so it was done in the Senate and was agreed to in conference.

Mr. MILLER. As I understand here, the trouble is not an act of poverty or wealth on the part of the Indian in that locality sufficient to support the school? Simply, it is not subject to the taxation?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. What is the gentleman's view of this being reimbursable?

Mr. CARTER. That, it seems to me, would simply get back to the treaty provision. The Supreme Court has decided that the Indians should not have their lands made subject to taxation, and this might be in violation of that decision of the Supreme Court. I would say to the gentleman I would be very glad, indeed, that, so far as I am concerned and my family is concerned, all the taxes on my allotment have been paid, in spite of the law.

Mr. MILLER. Which shows good public spirit.

Mr. CARTER. While I do feel deeply the need of these taxes for the State. I make no especial claim to public spirit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman when the item was included in the appropriation bill, as he states, in 1904, whether that is the same item that is in this bill?

Mr. CARTER. Not exactly.

Mr. MANN. That is what I thought. In what respect do they differ?

Mr. CARTER. I think there is practically no difference in their meaning.

Mr. MANN. Well, it is a matter of opinion as to what they mean.

Mr. CARTER. I have the original provision on my desk. If the gentleman means to say that the act of 1904 did not contemplate the education of white children, then I say there is absolutely no difference, because that is what is specifically set forth.

Mr. MANN. Well, that was at a time when the State of Oklahoma was the Territory of Oklahoma. Oklahoma was admitted in 1907. Was the item omitted in 1908?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This was known as the Five Tribes. The western part of the State of Oklahoma was not Territory.

Mr. MANN. I did not say anything about that. Was Oklahoma admitted as a State in 1907?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is right.

Mr. FERRIS. This item was cut to $150,000 on the motion of the Members from Oklahoma. We said if you will remove the restrictions we will not ask for any more school removals. Congress came to the rescue by the passage of the act of 1908, which was the removal-restriction act. The Supreme Court came along last winter and said that even though Congress decided these lands were taxable, they were not.

Mr. MANN. I do not always get the information I ask for, but I sometimes get very valuable information.

Now, in 1904 this was the Indian Territory.

Mr. CARTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. In 1905 it was the Indian Territory.

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. In 1906 it was the Indian Territory. In 1907 it was the Indian Territory.

Mr. FERRIS. It was a State in the fall.

Mr. MANN. The Government provided for the schools then. In 1908 it was the State of Oklahoma. We did not insert the item in the bill.

Mr. FERRIS. We did.

Mr. CARTER. Oh, yes; we did.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman stated a while ago that we did not.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman is mistaken. Here is the provision:

For the maintenance, strengthening, and enlarging of the tribal schools of the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole Nations, and making provision for the attendance of children of parents of other than Indian blood therein, and the establishment of new schools under the control of the Department of the Interior, the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior and disbursed by him under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman wants to insert an item of that kind in the bill, that is a different proposition. That is entirely different from this proposition. Here is an item of $300,000 for the common schools of Oklahoma. There was an item——

Mr. CARTER. For the same thing——

Mr. MANN. To provide money for the tribal schools of these Indians who were living in tribal relations.

Mr. CARTER. And also making provision for the attendance of children of parents of other than Indian blood.

Mr. MANN. While Oklahoma was a Territory we were providing schools there, but we are not under any obligation to provide schools in the State of Oklahoma.

Now, if the gentleman will pardon me, I appreciate the conditions there. I can see that the conditions are onerous. But, on the one hand, the gentleman comes into the House and insists, in violation, as I think, of the compact made in the House in reference to the deposit of money in the Oklahoma banks, that the Government shall pay the expenses of collection and that the Government shall pay the expense of salaries in order to save the Indians' money, and, on the other hand, says that because we can not collect taxes from the Indians the Government ought to maintain the schools. The Government gets it at both ends and in the middle.

If the money is needed for the maintenance of the common schools and you can not tax the Indian lands, why does the gentleman propose to reimburse it out of Indian funds?

Mr. CARTER. Let me ask the gentleman a question, as a lawyer?

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman need not ask me any question as a lawyer. I quit the practice of law some time ago, and I never answer a question of law without a retainer. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER. Not being a lawyer myself, Mr. Chairman, I am simply seeking legal advice from a distinguished legal light. I wanted to ask the gentleman, if, in view of the Supreme Court decision which sets forth that these Indians should not pay taxes on their lands, would such an act passed by this Congress be considered of sufficient validity to warrant the payment of the funds in lieu of taxes?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I should think that the court decision would not affect the matter one way or the other. The decision of the court was that the State of Oklahoma could not tax these lands. Whether the treaty is so drawn that the Government could make a fund reimbursable I do not undertake to say. But the decision of the Supreme Court has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. CARTER. That would be doing indirectly what you can not do directly.

Mr. MANN. That is what you want to do. You want to do that indirectly what you can not do directly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] on a point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I am unalterably opposed to the United States appropriating money out of the National Treasury for the common schools of any State of the Union unless such a condition arises which might be termed an emergency. I can see that such a condition might arise. It appears to me that in this case, Mr. Chairman, these Indians have been receiving practically this sum of money for quite a number of years for the purpose of maintaining common schools; not under the name of "common schools" up to 1908, but as tribal schools. I feel somewhat inclined to believe, Mr. Chairman, that if the committee will agree to make the sum $200,000, I will withdraw the point of order. I ask that the sum be made $200,000 until further arrangements can be made for the extension of these schools. If the gentlemen who are in charge of the bill will agree to that, I will withdraw my point of order.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad to do that if the gentleman can give me assurance that the point of order will not be made by some one else.

Mr. FOWLER. If I can get that understanding I will withdraw the point of order. I do not believe that there ought to be $300,000 appropriated under the circumstances. Oklahoma is one of the greatest States of this Union, and for her to come into the Halls of Congress and ask that the aid, the strong arm of this Government, be extended to maintain her free schools does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, a reflection upon that great State.

The CHAIRMAN. What does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] do with his point of order?

Mr. CARTER. I will compromise with the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman withdraw the point of order?

Mr. FOWLER. I withdraw the point of order on that understanding.

Mr. MANN. Then I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Chair will now dispose of a point of order made earlier in the day to an amendment sent up by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. PRAY]. This matter could not be ruled on at the time because there were quite a number of statutes and sections of statutes that had to be examined in order to ascertain the foundation upon which the amendment was supposed to rest. The first clause in the amendment provides for a survey of the lands of the Tongue River and Cheyenne River Indian Reservations. Now of course to justify the appropriation for this purpose there must be some authority conferred somewhere by some law. The gentleman from Montana [Mr. PRAY] sent up the following statute as supposedly furnishing authority for this particular appropriation. Leaving out intermediate matter, the statute is as follows:

That in all cases * * * the President of the United States, whenever in his opinion any reservation or any part thereof is advantageous for agricultural and grazing purposes, may cause such reservation to be surveyed.

This is a provision under which discretion is given to the President of the United States to have a survey made of any reservation. Under the amendment a department is authorized to make a survey of a particular reservation. The Chair is unable to see how authority that is given to the President to be exercised at his discretion furnishes authority for an amendment empowering a department to make a survey without regard to the wishes, judgment, or discretion of the President. Hence it seems to the Chair that the point of order to this portion of the amendment is certainly well taken. Under very familiar and abundant precedent, the point of order to the amendment being good as to a portion of the same, it is good as to the whole amendment. The point of order is therefore sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the act of Congress approved February 19, 1912 (Public, No. 91), being "An act to provide for the sale of the surface of the coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, and for other purposes" and the paragraph amendatory to such act contained in the act of Congress approved August 24, 1912 (Public, No. 335), entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, etc.," be, and the same are hereby, amended so as to provide that the classification and appraisement of such lands shall be completed by John G. Joyce, chief surveyor, not later than four months after the passage of this act.

Mr. MANN. I make a point of order against the paragraph read.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I hope the gentleman will reserve his point of order for the purpose of allowing an amendment to be offered to perfect the section.

Mr. MANN. I will reserve the point of order, but it is not possible to reserve it for the purpose of perfecting the section.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is the common usage to do that.

Mr. MANN. I am quite willing to reserve the point of order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I offer the amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, line 20, after the word "surveyor," state the following as a committee amendment:

"Under such rules and regulations, to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. CARTER. Does the gentleman from Illinois reserve a point of order?

Mr. MANN. I made a point of order, but if the gentleman wants to be heard, I will reserve it.

Mr. CARTER. It is getting late, Mr. Chairman, and I do not care to detain the House; but if there is any chance to persuade the gentleman not to insist on his point of order, I should like to plead with him.

Mr. MANN. I can not say. The gentleman has so often persuaded me against my better judgment that he might be able to do it again, although I have a pretty firm conviction on this subject at this time.

Mr. CARTER. I have not the remotest idea that I shall be able to convince the gentleman this time, because this item involves a subject about which the gentleman and I sometimes disagree. A subject, in fact, which I dislike to discuss, and which I presume the exigencies of the occasion demand that I speak of as sparingly as possible, and that is the administration of Indian affairs by the present régime.

On the 19th day of last February there was placed on the statute books an act providing for the appraisement and sale of the surface of the segregated mineral lands in the Choctaw Nation, in Oklahoma. This land had already been appraised once, and for that reason I opposed its reappraisement. Moreover, I felt sure that the very thing would happen that has happened; but out of deference to Members older than myself in service both on the committee and in this House, I agreed to the appointment of three appraisers at a certain stipulated compensation.

These three appraisers were appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, but not until almost two months after the act had become a law, and this in the face of the fact that the Secretary of the Interior knew these three gentlemen had only six months in which to complete the job. The three appraisers established their office at McAlester, Okla., and proceeded until the time expired within which they were to appraise the land. They then asked for an extension of time, which was very graciously granted by this Congress in the last Indian appropriation act. These three elegant gentlemen again proceeded with the appraisement of this land—that is, they say they proceeded—but notwithstanding the fact that there were less than 450,000 acres to be appraised, the time again expired with nothing whatever accomplished, except a fraudulent appraisement, as charged by the Indian Office, in Oklahoma for the making of which charges were brought against the appraisers and in the face of which they resigned without trial.

The Secretary then appointed, or now proposes to appoint, three other appraisers if we will give him the authority, but, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we have had enough of this horseplay for political purposes. It seems to me that there should be an end to any such tomfoolery as has been carried on by such political henchmen as these at the expense of the Indian people in Oklahoma. The present Secretary of the Interior is said to be a conservationist, and I believe that is true, for he has successfully conserved the interests of Republican politicians by the use of the funds of the Five Civilized Tribes ever since he has been in office, but he has done practically nothing toward the conservation of these funds or winding up of the tribal affairs except what has been forced upon him by this Congress.

The man, John G. Joyce, who is named in this bill, is one of the very few men who have been connected with Indian affairs in Oklahoma in the past against whom no charges of either incompetency or corruption have been lodged. His work has been clean. It has always been done expeditiously, and I believe even the authorities in charge of Indian affairs at Muskogee will give him a perfectly clean bill of health as to ability, competency, and integrity. The only objection that might be found to him, even by succeeding administrations, is that he is a rabid Republican.

Mr. MILLER. What was that adjective which the gentleman used?

Mr. CARTER. Rabid. I am speaking of an Oklahoma Indian official now; that might not apply to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER. I never heard of a "rabid" Republican.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman has not had the privilege of association with the Oklahoma brand. This gentleman, Mr. Joyce, is now in possession of all the information he needs, I think, to make the reappraisement of the agricultural and grazing lands. He has been over them recently and has surveyed them for appraisement purposes. I believe he could do it much more cheaply and much more expeditiously than anyone else could. I think the authorities at Muskogee would verify this statement.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. We have discussed this before. I presume it will go out on a point of order.

Mr. CARTER. I had hoped that it would not.

Mr. MILLER. I suppose the only advantage in this discussion is to get some information that will be of use in the future. As I stated when the gentleman was before the committee, it seemed to me that there were not sufficient records and data in Mr. Joyce's office to enable him to make this appraisal and report. It seems to me if anything is to be done to dispose of this very perplexing and sad matter, as the gentleman has characterized it, we ought to have some kind of a reappraisement, and some appropriation to permit the securing of additional data upon which to make the reappraisement. If I have not been correctly informed I shall be glad to have the gentleman discuss at some length the question of how much data Mr. Joyce has, and why he thinks he could now make such a reappraisement.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Joyce has been over almost every acre of the land except that which is close enough to town sites to make it valuable for town-site purposes. He has already placed a valuation on practically all of the agricultural and grazing lands.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. CARTER. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have no objection, if we can close the debate at the end of the five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for five minutes more, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] asks that at the end of that time the debate on this paragraph be closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Has he made an appraisement of some of these lands in the vicinity of South McAlester?

Mr. CARTER. I just said he has not appraised anything which is near enough to a town to be valuable for town-site purposes.

Mr. MILLER. The commissioners have performed some work that has brought criticism and hostility upon them, in the matter of appraising certain tracts of land near South McAlester. How could Mr. Joyce go ahead now and make an appraisement of such very valuable lands as these, which are the most valuable of the lands he would have to appraise, without getting some additional data? He certainly could not base his estimates on the report of the commissioners, because a prima facie case is made out against that report.

Mr. CARTER. There is already an appropriation of $30,000.

Mr. MILLER. Has it not all been used?

Mr. CARTER. I assume that about one-half of it has been used.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The amount appropriated was $50,000.

Mr. CARTER. My recollection is that it was reduced to $30,000.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. My recollection is that $15,000 was expended by the appraisers, who did not accomplish anything.

Mr. CARTER. I think that is true, and that would leave $15,000 with which to complete the work.

Mr. MILLER. If $30,000 was needed in the first place to make the appraisement, and $15,000 was spent without accomplishing anything, how are you going to make $15,000 complete the appraisement?

Mr. CARTER. I think if the gentleman understood the character of the Oklahoma Indian officials he would know that one good man can always be depended upon to do the work in about one-third the time and for one-tenth the cost that three men can do it. I feel sure that if this man, who all agree is one of the most competent men in the Indian service, is given charge of this work that the work will be expeditiously, correctly, and economically completed for this sum.

Mr. MILLER. Will he have it done under his supervision and with additional machinery and time?

Mr. CARTER. If the point of order is withdrawn a committee amendment will be offered directing the work to be done by the surveyor in chief, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. The omission of this language was an oversight.

Mr. MILLER. It has always been one of the fundamental beliefs that when you have an appraisal of real estate there should be three appraisers. In the laws of all the States providing for appraisement of lands, like guardianship cases, where land is taken for public purposes under eminent domain, and all matters of that kind, the provision is that there shall be three appraisers.

Mr. CARTER. That has not been true in Oklahoma. We only had two appraisers for the appraisal of the allotted lands. Furthermore, I call attention to the fact that every acre of this land has been appraised before, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and that something like 3,000,000 acres of land has been sold under this original appraisement which these lands had at a past date; why, then, all this ado about additional appraisement?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Without particular reference to this item, I would like to ask the gentleman if he believes it is good legislation to name some particular individual to do something of this kind?

Mr. CARTER. The Secretary of the Interior has had his innings at the appointing of political henchmen to appraise these lands. He pondered and equivocated for almost two months, totally ignoring good Indian applicants who would have done the work conscientiously and expeditiously and who, since their salaries were drawn from the Indian funds, should have been given preference, finally letting his favor fall upon three men, all of whom have admitted their corruption by resigning under charges of fraud.

I would not object to striking out the name of John G. Joyce if that would satisfy the sensibilities of any Member, but I insist that this work must be done by some one who is competent and reliable, and such a man seems to have been utterly unable to find favor with the present powers that be.

It has now been almost a year since the appraisement of these lands was provided, and not one single acre has yet been offered for sale. How long, O Lord, will the present Republican administration hold up the settlement of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes and clog the wheels of commerce and progress in our State? What all the people of our State want—Indians and whites alike—is to get these appraisements and sales accomplished as quickly and as cheaply as possible and without any scandal, if you please, as to fraudulent appraisements. And unless some plan can be formulated which will give us assurance of this, then I think we might as well wait until after the 4th of March, when we hope to have a good business administration which will conduct its work upon the grounds of benefits to all the people rather than of satisfying the political organization of some particular party.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the item in the bill proposes to amend two existing laws. The law now provides that the appraisement and classification shall be completed by the 1st of last December, I think, by the appraisers appointed through the Interior Department by the Secretary of the Interior. It is proposed here to amend these laws so as to provide that the clasisfication and appraisement shall be made by a particular individual, not later than four months after the passage of this act. That, of course, extends the time for making the appraisement until the 1st of July, where it is now fixed by law as the 1st of December. I presume the appraisal ought to be made, if it has not been made. I can imagine that there are cases where Congress may specifically provide that a particular individual shall perform a certain function. Usually that is where everybody in the legislative body is familiar with the person named. With the greatest respect to my friend from Oklahoma who has suggested this name, I do not know whether his judgment in reference to this man is any better than that of the Secretary of the Interior in appointing the appraisers, and it seems to me it is not a wise change of law to provide, where the law authorizes the appointment of three men to make classification and appraisement, to name a particular individual and say that he shall make the classification and appraisement.

I have less hesitation in making this statement because the gentleman may get the next Secretary of the Interior, who will probably be under the thumb of the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma, to do whatever he pleases.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to get anybody under my thumb. What I expect to do is to get out from under the thumb of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MANN. I did not say that the gentleman would get anybody under his thumb. I said the distinguished gentlemen from Oklahoma would probably have the next Secretary of the Interior under their thumb to do the things like this. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The provision on its face proposes to amend existing law, and therefore is obnoxious to the rule. The point of order is therefore sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 600 Indian pupils, including native pupils brought from Alaska, at the Indian school, Salem, Oreg., and for pay of superintendent, $102,000; for general repairs and improvements, $9,000; in all, $111,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out of line 4, page 25, the sum "$9,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$15,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 25, line 4, by striking out "$9,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$15,000."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

Mr. HAWLEY. I submit that it is not subject to a point of order, as it is only an increase in the amount.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I did not catch the purport of the amendment, and I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment, which increases the amount for repairs and improvements by $6,000, is to provide for an adequate water system and supply for the Chemawa Indian school, a school that has between 600 and 700 pupils and a number of employees. At my request the superintendent of the school wrote me a letter about the matter.

He said:

The wooden tower and tank now in service are worthless for the purposes for which they were erected many years ago. The tank has been out of service for about eight years, since which time it has not been used at all, but a small one, holding a few hundred barrels of water, located about 30 feet above ground, has been used in lieu thereof. The large one became contaminated in some way, and an analysis made this past fall for me by the chemist at the agricultural college at Corvallis showed that the water was reeking with typhoid germs. The tank is old, and as this condition has obtained for years, it was the opinion of the chemist that it could not be cleaned in such a manner as to render it safe for storing water again. The wooden tower is unsafe, the sills and timber being unsound, and the cost of rebuilding it would be so great that as a matter of economy and good business judgment a new steel tower of adequate height to afford fire protection should be erected. So far as the water system is concerned we are practically without any fire protection, which in a plant of this size, where most of the buildings are of wood, renders the situation serious. We need to have two more wells driven in addition to those now in service. The water is of splendid quality, but the wells we now have are to small and not deep enough for the demands being made upon them.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. FOSTER. Where is the source of the supply of water for the town of Salem, Oreg?

Mr. HAWLEY. From a bulkhead in the river, just a little above the town.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that water used for drinking purposes?

Mr. HAWLEY. In Salem?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is.

Mr. FOSTER. Has there been any complaint in reference to the water that is pumped from the river there which goes to the people of Salem?

Mr. HAWLEY. From time to time there is an occasional complaint.

Mr. FOSTER. Why is it not more economical to get that water from the city of Salem than to do as the gentleman suggests?

Mr. HAWLEY. They would have to build a pipe line for about 6 miles.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it 6 miles from Salem?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; and the right of way would cost many times this amount, I take it, in addition to the material and labor necessary for the construction of the pipe line. They have drilled some good deep wells and they can drill others, at moderate cost, and they can, by putting in a new pump and a new steel tank, and doing away with this tank, get an adequate water supply for the use of the school which will be entirely healthful to the Indian children. It will furthermore provide a protection against fire. Many of the buildings are old. They have some hundreds of boys and girls in them. Some are wooden buildings, and they can not get water into the second story of the buildings at the present time, in any quantity, with the system they now have. It seems to me that upon the ground of humanity and economy and of necessity this small addition to the appropriation ought to be made.

Mr. FOSTER. How far is this school from the river?

Mr. HAWLEY. That would only be a matter of guess. I would guess 2 or 3 miles.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that two months ago I visited this school, among others on the Pacific coast. I found this an excellent school. The repairs to this water tower and tank are necessary. It was my understanding and the paper I have in my hand shows that the repairs and improvements were estimated at $10,000. We gave them $9,000, and the superintendent informed me that the main improvement they needed there was this water tank. As stated by the gentleman from Oregon, it is in bad condition, and I think that a new steel tower should be put up and the old one taken down.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is it the gentleman's opinion that this $9,000 appropriated here provides for this water tank?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. "General repair and improvement." That will be sufficient, in my judgment. I do not think there is any question about that. They would have a right to use that to take down the old one and put up a new one.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman further yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. In the book here which the committee has for its information in preparing this bill I find this statement:

> The superintendent has estimated for necessary repairs $10,000.

That would not include the purchase of the new pump and motor, the new steel tank, the steel for the frame of the tank, and the drilling of the wells. That would leave only $3,000 for the repairs of all kind, and on so large a plant as that it would be manifestly inadequate.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I was informed that the well was sufficient, and that the trouble was with the tank. They said the tank and supports for the tank. That is possibly 50 feet high.

Mr. HAWLEY. They have a little tank that is just 30 feet above the ground, not high enough for protection. The well they have will fill the present tank. If a sufficiently large tank is provided, and they have to have at least one good additional well, a good service will be provided.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I was not informed in regard to that.

Mr. HAWLEY. I went over the ground just a few days after the gentleman did and went particularly into the items.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Was the gentleman with the superintendent?

Mr. HAWLEY. I was with the superintendent and some of the other officers of the school.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This was pointed out to me as the main improvement which they desired. However, they said that on the south side of the road they desired to increase the chapel, or the general assembly hall, to add about 40 feet onto the building. That was the second request that he made.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am interested now in the adequate water supply for these students, and I hope the gentleman will let the proposed small increase be passed by the committee.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I think the statement here, for repairs and improvements, $10,000, certainly estimated for that water tank. I would be willing to strike out $9,000 and insert $10,000. That is all they asked for.

Mr. HAWLEY. The statement given here is for necessary repairs, $10,000.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Suppose we add the words "including water tank."

Mr. HAWLEY. Would that provide the necessary money?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think so. I think there will be sufficient for that, but I am willing to include that language.

Mr. HAWLEY. Why not let the entire amount of $6,000 go in, but limit it by the language "or so much thereof as may be necessary"?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Nine thousand dollars is carried in the bill now.

Mr. HAWLEY. That would make $15,000 in all.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think that would be in excess of the demands that were stated to me as being necessary.

Mr. HAWLEY. The superintendent of the school, in a direct reply to a telegraphic inquiry from me, writes this letter, and he sends me a telegram that the total estimate and cost of this particular improvement would be $6,000, and that the need is urgent.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. He did not mention whether or not he intended to use any of the other fund, did he?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not think he was advised.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I see the superintendent estimated $10,000 for repairs and improvements and $14,500 for the building.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. Of course the buildings are not provided for in the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No; the building was to be an addition to the hall on the south side of the road.

Mr. MANN. Perhaps the term "buildings" there included also the building of the water tower. That is the reason of my inquiry.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It might be that.

Mr. HAWLEY. The term "buildings" includes an office building, a physician's cottage, and two employees' cottages.

Mr. MANN. The superintendent's estimate for repairs and improvements is $10,000. That included the watering tank if it is not included in "buildings."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I would be willing, Mr. Chairman, to let the amount be $12,000, and we can arrange the matter herafter if necessary.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I will therefore modify my amendment so that $12,000 will be appropriated in this item instead of nine thousand, so providing for the water system.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 26, line 4, strike out the figures "9,000" and insert in lieu thereof "12,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to correct the totals.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be done.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, have we passed the Pennsylvania item?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There is no change made in the Pennsylvania item.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is no change?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the committee for one moment while I call attention to a speech in to-day's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 1087, by my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED]. We are considering the Indian appropriation bill and have just passed an item relating to the Carlisle Indian School, in which Mr. OLMSTED has been interested during his 16 years of service in this House. I know of no man in the Pennsylvania delegation who has found a warmer place in the hearts of the Members of the House, or who has so endeared himself to the Pennsylvania Members as this distinguished Representative. [Applause.]

I observe with considerable regret that the speech, which I hope is not the swan song of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, starts out in its references to the Carlisle School by indicating that this is the last time he shall appear in Congress in its behalf. Mr. OLMSTED has been the devoted champion of the Carlisle School during the long period of his Membership here, and has stood by it through thick and thin, and in the stress of fair as well as of foul legislative weather.

The Indian school at Carlisle is one of those institutions of the Government of which we have a right to be proud, and the people of Pennsylvania are surely proud of the attitude which Mr. OLMSTED has taken with regard to it throughout his congressional career. And may I be permitted to speak of the references in his speech, to the characteristics of the students, both boys and girls, who have gone forth from that school, concerning some of whom I have had personal knowledge. They have developed well and have been a credit to the institution in which they were reared and have justified the attitude of the Government in making the expenditures it has made to thus improve the educational condition of these its wards.

I notice, too, that my colleague, Mr. OLMSTED, refers to some of those athletic qualities of the young men who have gone forth from this school; boys who have attained fame in the great field of baseball, and who have developed in the equally interesting field of football, and to one who has recently come through an international contest as champion of all the athletes in the world.

I recall that in this House not many months ago there sat a boy of his, the junior Marlin E. Olmsted, in whom, perhaps, he is more interested than in any other person in the world, except the fair lady who presides over his household, and that it was about the very time when the Indians were making a successful campaign in baseball. I overheard the lad, looking into the face of our distinguished colleague, say, "Father, is it not time that you should leave this House and go with me to the ball field?" The father, reluctant to leave his post of duty, said, "My boy, I can not go now; it is necessary for me to remain and save the country." And then the bright lad, looking anxiously into his father's kindly countenance, said, "Oh, shucks! Why not leave the salvation of the country to Mr. MANN?" [Laughter.]

We have reached a stage in the proceedings and a stage in the career of my distinguished colleague when we are almost about to say good-by. He has said good-by to the Carlisle School. He has left it in our keeping. And after he has gone back to private life and the practice of the law, where he will shine even more brilliantly than he did in this House, may we not intrust to Mr. MANN and the other saviors of our country the preservation and the perpetuation of the Carlisle Indian School? [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For support of Sioux of different tribes, including Santee Sioux of Nebraska, North Dakota, and South Dakota: For pay of 5 teachers, 1 physician, 1 carpenter, 1 miller, 1 engineer, 2 farmers, and 1 blacksmith (art. 13, treaty of Apr. 29, 1868), $10,400; for pay of second blacksmith, and furnishing iron, steel, and other material (art. 8 of same treaty), $1,600; for pay of additional employees at the several agencies for the Sioux in Nebraska, North Dakota, and South Dakota, $95,000; for subsistence of the Sioux, other than the Rosebud, Cheyenne, and Standing Rock Tribes, and for purposes of their civilization (act of Feb. 28, 1877), $200,000: Provided, That this sum shall include transportation of supplies from the termination of railroad or steamboat transportation, and in this service Indians shall be employed whenever practicable; in all, $307,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert the word "River" after the word "Cheyenne," in line 3, page 21.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against this paragraph for the purpose of asking the chairman of this committee by what authority of law this appropriation is requested. In fact, I desire to ask the chairman if it is not a fact that on April 29, 1868, there was a treaty made between the United States and this tribe of Indians—the Sioux—with a limitation of 20 years; and I desire further to inquire if on March 2, 1899, this treaty was not renewed between the United States and this tribe of Indians, with a limitation of 20 years? I further desire to inquire if this treaty did not expire on March 2, 1909, and is not the request in this bill for this appropriation without any authority whatever?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Texas will yield to me, as the inquiry covers practically the whole history of the Sioux Indians.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; I yield to the gentleman. The question refers to the gentleman's own State and district.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the treaty of 1868 was limited to 20 years. A treaty was made with the Sioux Tribes in 1889 by which they ceded about 9,000,000 acres of land to the Government, and the balance of their reservation was divided into separate reservations, there being the Standing Rock, the Cheyenne River, the Rosebud, the Pine Ridge, the Crow Creek, and the Lower Brule Tribes. The treaty of 1889 in some particulars was limited to 20 years. The gentleman is right about that. But, Mr. Chairman, there is a treaty, made in 1877, that is unlimited. I have referred to it on other occasions in this House as being probably the best treaty from the Indian standpoint that was ever made with any tribe of Indians in this country, because it was not limited as to time, and under the treaty of 1877, at the time that the Black Hills were ceded to the United States, it was provided that the United States guaranteed in perpetuity to provide these Indians with subsistence, to provide them with the means of education and civilization until such time as they should be self-supporting.

So I say it is the best treaty in regard to the provisions for the subsistence, support, and civilization of Indians that has ever been made.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire about the treaty of 1877? Did not that refer to the treaty of 1868, and was it not to be governed by the terms of that treaty?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It had no reference to it whatever, Mr. Chairman, and was a separate and distinct treaty by itself.

I want to call the gentleman's attention to what has actually transpired under the treaty of 1877, and I may say in passing that the Indians in the last couple of years have been very much discontented and dissatisfied over the cession of the Black Hills and are now trying to repudiate the treaty of 1877 on the ground that it was not executed in accordance with the provisions of the treaty of 1868, in that it was not signed by three-fourths of the adult male members of the tribe. They think that they did not get an adequate consideration for the lands that were ceded by that treaty. They overlook the fact that they did receive a large sum of money, because we guaranteed, as I have stated, to provide them with subsistence for all time. When I came to Congress, only a few years ago, we were annually appropriating $900,000 for the item which is now $200,000, for the support and civilization of the Sioux under the treaty of 1877.

Now, the gentleman may wonder how we have been able to reduce the amount, and I am going to explain how it was done. In the treaty of 1889 it was provided that after the allotments of lands were made the surplus lands should be sold and the money should go into the Treasury and be subject to appropriation by Congress for the support and civilization of the tribes.

We have had several land openings, one affecting the Cheyenne River, one the Standing Rock, and two or three the Rosebud, so that in making the appropriation this year we make no provision for those three tribes of Indians, and we are now supporting them and providing them with subsistence out of the moneys that were received from the sale of their lands.

But as to the question of authority for the appropriation, I can only answer the gentleman that the treaty of 1877 is still in full force and effect and has not been annulled.

Mr. FOWLER. The treaty of 1868 was in force at that time, was it not?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It was at the time of the making of the treaty of 1877.

Mr. FOWLER. What was the necessity for it?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do not know what the necessity was.

Mr. FOWLER. What was the occasion for the renewal of the treaty of 1889, with the limitation of 20 years?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I am unable to state what the need of it was. I am simply stating the fact that the obligation of the Government for all time to care for and support these Indians was in no manner modified by the treaty of 1889. That was in the treaty of 1877, and that treaty is to-day in full force and effect; and were it not for the fact that we have required that these three tribes, which comprise about two-thirds of the general Sioux Tribe, be supported out of the moneys that have come in from the sale of their lands, we would be appropriating to-day about a million dollars a year instead of $200,000.

Mr. FOWLER. If the treaty of 1877 was not to be construed with the treaty of 1868, why should the treaty of 1868 be extended in 1889?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Well, I am unable to state why. I simply know that the treaty of 1889 was limited to 20 years in some of its provisions.

Mr. FOWLER. My recollection of the treaty of 1877 is that it did not deal with this question directly, independent of the treaty of 1868, but it was with some minor points connected with this treaty or with the subject matter with which the treaty of 1868 dealt directly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. It guaranteed in perpetuity, perhaps, some of the requirement of the treaty of 1868 that were limited.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire, as my colleague, Dr. FOSTER, of Illinois, reserved a point of order, and as he has perhaps some questions regarding this treaty of 1877 to propound, to yield the floor to him.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, the only question in my mind with reference to this matter is whether the treaty of 1868, which ran for 20 years and then was renewed for 20 years more, is in effect now or has expired.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The treaty of 1889, I will say to the gentleman, has expired, and I think everything in the treaty of 1868 has expired except as it might have been specifically extended by the treaty of 1877. But the treaty of 1877 is not limited as to time.

Mr. FOSTER. In any particular?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would not say in any particular at all, but as to time it is not limited, with perhaps this exception, that the obligation was until such time as the Indians would become self-supporting.

Mr. FOSTER. Then what is the gentleman's idea of the law of 1889?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that there are two separate and distinct considerations for the two treaties. The treaty of 1877 ceded to the United States the Black Hills, and the treaty of 1889 ceded, in round numbers, 9,000,000 acres, leaving the Indians about 11,000,000 acres, which was divided into the separate reservations which I have named.

Mr. FOSTER. It occurs to me that it is a question whether this act of 1877 did cover the support of these Indians. That is the only question in my mind about this matter.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman that I do not think there is any question about it. I have looked it up on several occasions. Of course, the gentleman will take into consideration the fact that there are over 20,000 Indians, and that if there was no treaty obligation whatever we would be very fortunate if we were escaping with an appropriation no larger than the one we are making. If it was a gratuity, like every other gratuity appropriation it would be subject to a point of order; but so far as the Sioux of South Dakota are concerned, we are making appropriations in accordance with the obligation incurred by reason of the treaty of 1877, which is the one that authorizes this appropriation.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I think I shall make the point of order and let the Chair decide it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If the gentleman will withhold his point of order just a moment, I will ask him, in perfect good faith, if he believed that there was no authority whatever for making this appropriation would he make a point of order and leave these Indians without any protection, so far as the Federal Government is concerned? I am assuming now that there is no authority for the appropriation. Would the gentleman do that to 20,000 Indians?

Mr. FOSTER. How are these Indians situated in reference to their own property?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The Indians have allotments, and very liberal ones, as I have heretofore stated. The land is only fit practically for grazing purposes, each head of a family has 640 acres, but it is mostly unproductive.

Mr. FOSTER. And they have some money in the United States Treasury?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. They have a trust fund of $3,000,000.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me that on yesterday I heard the gentleman say that the less the Indians were left to depend on the Government the better it would be for them and the more civilizing influence it would have.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes; and I will say to the gentleman that I have found a way by which we could take care of the greater part of these Indians out of moneys that have gone into the Treasury to their credit, and I believe it is a better use to make of that money to appropriate it and expend it for their civilization rather than to civilize and educate them at the expense of the United States and store up a great fund to be disbursed at some future time.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the gentleman think this might be a good place to put his idea into operation as to what ought to be done for the Indians? Will not the Indians be made self-reliant in South Dakota by acting in accordance with the gentleman's idea?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do not think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] is sincere when he intimates that "the gentleman from South Dakota" has ever in any way indicated that he would withdraw the protection of the Government from the Indian until he has reached that stage of civilization where he is able to take care of himself.

Mr. FOSTER. It occurs to me that yesterday the gentleman did not qualify his statement in the way he does to-day.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The remark I made is in the RECORD, and the gentleman can read it for himself.

Mr. FOSTER. Yesterday the gentleman wanted to get a reservation sold, and one of the reasons he mentioned was that it was a bad thing for the Indian to make him feel that there was something coming to him from the United States Government.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Indefinitely.

Mr. FOSTER. That he ought to be made self-reliant. Now, to-day the gentleman comes to the House and asks Congress to appropriate for the support of these Indians.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. I do not come to the House with it. The bill is brought here by the committee.

Mr. FOSTER. I mean, the gentleman is advocating the proposition that this appropriation is proper and right.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Yes; certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the better way to put it. Now, does not the gentleman think it would be a good thing to begin in South Dakota to carry out the gentleman's scheme of making the Indians self-reliant?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think we have perhaps made as much progress in the civilization of the Indians in South Dakota as in any other part of the country.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not doubt that.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I have stated heretofore, and I now reiterate, that just as soon as the Indian reaches a point where he is competent to take care of himself, then, I say, the sooner we withdraw all Federal aid or supervision of his affairs the better for him.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman from South Dakota think we are very much nearer to it than we were the first time that he entered this House as a Member?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I certainly think so.

Mr. FOSTER. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that this is not authorized by law, as the treaty of 1868 expired and was renewed for 20 years, and then became effective for 20 years more, is not in effect now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call upon the committee to produce the law which supports the amendment.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I have called the attention of the Chair to the treaty of 1877.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the treaty of 1877 provide for the employment of Indians, as contemplated by this amendment?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do not think the gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that Indian labor shall be employed wherever possible. If he bases it on that, we will have to modify it. I presume he bases the point of order on the claim that there is no authority of law for the appropriation.

Mr. FOSTER. That there is no authority of law for the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call upon the committee, if they undertake to support the bill in this respect, to furnish him the authority of law upon which they rely.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the Chair that here is an appropriation that has been made for years and years, and no Member has ever raised a point of order against it. If the point of order is insisted upon, as I assume it is, then I ask unanimous consent that the matter may be passed over until we can furnish the Chair with the authority that justifies the appropriation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have no objection. We have to rise at 5 o'clock, and I think we ought to proceed with the bill as far as possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks that this particular provision of the bill may be passed over without prejudice, to be returned to at the pleasure of the committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and maintenance of day and industrial schools among the Sioux Indians, including the erection and repairs of school buildings, $200,000, to be expended under the agreement with said Indians in section 17 of the act of March 2, 1889, which agreement is hereby extended to and including June 30, 1914.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to that item.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will reserve the point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to say that in this bill we are appropriating money for schools. I do not know how much truth there may be in all the statements that are made, but I observe that it is claimed in an article that I saw in the New York Herald, in reference to Indian affairs, that there is a school in North Dakota which the commissioner has asked to be abandoned, and yet it is impossible to get it closed up.

Now, the gentleman from South Dakota is not only familiar with the situation in his State, but I take it that with his long service on the Committee on Indian Affairs he is conversant with the situation in North Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is any foundation for the statement that we are maintaining a lot of Indian schools, especially this one, appropriating for it, merely because it has been established, and like any other Government institution located in the community, it is very hard and almost impossible to get it abandoned?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I have not seen the article that the gentleman refers to so that I do not know to what school it refers. I presume it refers to the school at Wahpeton or at Bismarck, in North Dakota.

Mr. FOSTER. It is the school at Bismarck.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think the department on one or two occasions failed to estimate for the Bismarck school, and was opposed to the appropriation for its continuation. But the committee looked upon it differently and provided for it. This appropriation that the gentleman has raised the point of order against is entirely to be expended for the reservation schools. It has no reference to a nonreservation school, such as the one at Bismarck, N. Dak.

Mr. FOSTER. I wanted to get the gentleman's idea about the school at Bismarck. I happened to be called away when the item was passed and did not get an opportunity, or I should have moved to strike it out.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Last year it was represented to the committee that the school at Fort Berthold, west of Bismarck, had been burned, and that Bismarck was located centrally so that the Indian pupils could be obtained from the several reservations, and that there was a need for its continuation, and that by continuing it we might avoid rebuilding the school where the one was burned. At any rate, the committee last year appropriated for the school, notwithstanding it was not estimated for. But my recollection is that this year the school was estimated for. That school was located originally at Bismarck against the judgment of the Indian Department, and it was done at the instance of the Representatives and Senators from that State who thought that there ought to be an Indian school at Bismarck, and one was provided. But that is in another State from my State.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be natural for the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to estimate for the school this year after he had refused to estimate for it and Congress had appropriated for it.

Now, another question. Does not the gentleman think that this is possibly a good time to spend some of this money in the Treasury for the education of the Indians and let them spend their own money to become self-reliant, as long as the gentleman from South Dakota believes in that policy?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. As far as the Sioux Indians are concerned, I think it will be admitted that largely at my instance the Federal Treasury has been relieved from the expense of several hundred thousand dollars annually in moneys that are necessary for the care and support of the Indians by taking it out of their own funds. I have gone to the extreme, and to such an extent that at the present time the Sioux Indians are not feeling very kindly toward me. They are human.

Mr. FOSTER. I am so far away from them that I do not think they can get at me.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman from Illinois ought to realize that these are the real Indians of the country; they are not mixed bloods. Most of them are full bloods, and only a few years ago were blanket Indians. I am speaking of the Sioux.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the gentleman think that the money that they have in the Treasury is sufficient to pay the expenses of their education?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that there are two or three of the Sioux Tribes that have no money in the Treasury, except their interest in the $3,000,000 trust fund which bears 5 per cent interest, and half of that may be expended by the Secretary of the Interior for education.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course, I realize that this is a tribal school, and upon a better footing than some of the other schools.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The item in the bill to which the gentleman raises the point of order contains no appropriation that is used for any school outside of the reservation.

Mr. FOSTER. I see that there is some merit in this that is not in some of the others, but in view of the fact that we have appropriated quite a large sum of money for other schools in South Dakota, unless we can get rid of some of the other schools I shall have to insist on letting this item go out.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like unanimous consent to have this item passed, in order that we may furnish authority of law for the appropriation.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, we have heard with no little pleasure about the tremendous extravagance prevailing in the State of Oklahoma, and with no little patience about the rigid economy that has been practiced in South Dakota. I want to call attention to some of the unusual, fabulous economies prevailing in that remarkable State.

They have 20,352 Indians. They are worth $41,015,702.05. They receive in Federal moneys this year $646,500. The specific appropriations for specific schools with a little handful of Indians—20,000—as follows:

Flandreau, $60,500; Pierre, $42,000; Rapid City, $53,500. The Sioux get $207,000. The Sioux again get $200,000 in a separate paragraph, unless this point of order is sustained, and following down the bill the Yanktons get $14,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is the situation in the State of Oklahoma. We have one school specifically provided for and only one. In the State of Oklahoma we have approximately 120,000 Indians. In the State of South Dakota they have 20,000 Indians. Here we have an item so patent that it is subject to a point of order, that it specifically prescribes that it shall be carried along for another year. The item that has been passed by unanimous consent is clearly subject to a point of order. In 1868 they provided a treaty, which was a fat one indeed, which lasted for 20 years. That carried it along until 1889. It was then extended for 20 more years. That has expired and four years have elapsed since that time. The treaty of 1877, conjured from somewhere, the Lord only knows, is intended to obviate both of these former treaties, but it does not do it. The treaty of 1877, in article 8, prescribes as follows:

> The provisions of said treaty in 1868, except that herein modified, shall continue in full force.

I read from the treaty of 1877, which reached back and subjects those Indians to the same limitations that the treaty of 1868 imposed upon them.

I do not know what the attitude of the Chair may be; I do not know what the attitude of the House may be; but I want to say here and now, with nearly all the Indians in the United States in our State, that I shall not sit here longer and have our State muckraked and hounded without letting this House know the true facts. Our State has nearly half the Indians in the whole country, and some of the provisions in the Oklahoma section of the bill read as follows. I refer now to the tribe of Indians that reside in the county in which I live. This is to pay the agents, to pay the help, to pay the people who administer the affairs of those Indians, usually appointments made strictly from a partisan standpoint. This is the language:

> The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States, at his discretion, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the funds on deposit to the credit of the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Tribes of Indians in Oklahoma, for the support of the agency and pay of employees maintained for their benefit.

There are two sides to this question, and there are two good, strong sides to it. We withdraw the money from the Treasury that belongs to the Indians to pay the help in my State. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] has every little one-horse school in his State provided for specifically, and lugs in two items embodying $507,000 that are gratituities and nothing more, with the treaties expired more than four years, and he asks that he should be considered the great economist in behalf of Indian Affairs in his State, and that everyone shall point the finger of scorn to our State where nearly all of the Indians in the country reside. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] is probably undergoing the kind of punishment which some gentlemen on the other side of the aisle think they can administer to gentlemen who do not kotow to them. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] has committed the crime of expressing his opinion upon the floor of the House concerning certain frauds committed by the people of Oklahoma in their courts and elsewhere. Thereupon the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], for the purpose of coming back at the gentleman from South Dakota——

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. In a moment—and endeavoring to teach him what punishment he will receive if he does not bow before the gentleman from Oklahoma, proceeds to assault an item in the Indian appropriation bill, which has been there for years, which was reported by the gentleman's own committee without any objection on his part.

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; but I did not know that the treaty had expired at that time. I know it now.

Mr. MANN. There are many things, Mr. Chairman, which the gentleman did not know, having served on the Committee on Indian Affairs for many years, that he ought to have known. He has reported this item for years without this knowledge. I am glad that he has learned something on that subject. He will probably learn a great deal more upon other subjects if he endeavors to follow this kind of course in the House.

Mr. FERRIS. And gentlemen on that side will learn something, too.

Mr. MANN. It seems items are not to be considered on their merits, but from the standpoint of endeavoring to punish gentlemen on this side of the House, or upon that, who do not bow before him.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I suppose the gentleman is preparing in that way to become the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman think it is punishing anybody to call the attention of the House to two provisions aggregating $507,000 that are carried on their face as treaty items when the treaties have expired? Is that punishing anybody?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the purpose the gentleman has in view, having reported this bill himself from his committee, in calling attention to the matter at all is punishment, in an endeavor to deter gentlemen in the House from running against his wishes.

Mr. FERRIS. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. We will let that side of the House determine who shall be the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, but whoever is the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, or of any other committee of the House, will find, and gentlemen will find, that because some Member on the floor of the House properly calls attention to an item in some place which he believes ought not to be in the bill he can not, therefore, be punished by striking out items in which that particular gentleman may be interested. Even a Democratic administration will not stand for such unfair conduct as that.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman, following his usual tactics, rises in his seat and seeks to chastise me as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs because I call attention to two items which on their face are clearly subject to point of order; and not only that, but because I have called attention to two items which are being touted along in this bill as treaty items when, in fact, the treaty has expired. If the gentleman wanted to appropriate money gratuitously for these people, he should bring it in here as a gratuity. I did not know when this bill was considered in the committee that this item was subject to a point of order or I should have made the point at that time. I have since had it called to my attention. It has also been called to my attention upon the floor of the House. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], from the gentleman's own State, make the point of order, and if the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] thinks that by badgering me and dragging in some reference to an outside and a wholly extrinsic matter he can close my mouth he is seriously mistaken.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not think anything could close the gentleman's mouth—not even his own head.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, if the excitement has subsided, I renew my request that this item be passed along with the other item until we can have an opportunity to submit authorities to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAY). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, before this item is passed, I desire to say that I disclaim any idea of punishing any Member on the floor of this House in any way whatever, and if the reference of my genial colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] sought to include me as wanting to punish anybody, I desire to say to him in all candor that I have no disposition to punish any man on the floor of this House, here or elsewhere.

My action was prompted from a sincere desire to learn the facts. Being a new Member, and for the first time having had an opportunity to investigate these treaties, I sought to see in good faith as to whether there is any legal authority for this appropriation. And I say in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that whenever I am accused of making any objection here other than in the interests of the people of the United States, I disclaim any such statement. [Applause.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] one minute.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] should take umbrage at the action of my colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] in the simple exercise of his right to call attention to provisions of this bill which might be subject to points of order. If the gentleman should apply this rule to himself, it would be necessary for this House to employ a professional scold to do the job.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes points of order regardless where the chips may fall. Many times have I and other Members been the victims of this gentleman's points of order on propositions of undisputed merit, as the gentleman himself will admit. Only this afternoon two propositions went out of this bill on points of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], one of them the item of $300,000 to aid the common schools of our State, the justice of which I do not think the gentleman himself will dispute. But now, because, forsooth, a gentleman from Oklahoma would simply point out similar provisions in the appropriations of some other State, the gentleman from Illinois feels called upon to read him a lecture on the good behavior of a Member of Congress.

It is passing strange, Mr. Chairman, that a gentleman of the usual astute fairness of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] should take this partisan view of a Member's duty. It is more than passing strange that points of order made by that side of the House against the provisions of Members on this side are considered of such high merit and virtue, yet when the matter is reversed and a Member from this side presumes to even call attention to the fact that a provision defended by the gentleman on that side of the aisle is subject to a point of order it becomes a seething outrage sufficient to warrant the unjustified attack we have just heard made against my colleague, Mr. FERRIS.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, pending the points of order on the two last paragraphs.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 26874, the Indian appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield sufficient time for the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] to make a request.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, January 8, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 16843. An act to consolidate the veterinary service, United States Army, and to increase its efficiency, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of House bill 19115, known as the omnibus claims bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly know as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], I think, had not concluded his remarks yesterday.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, when I stopped yesterday, the hour having arrived for the assembling of the court, I was speaking about the proposition made by the report of the Committee on Claims, which, it seemed to me, would lead to changing the rule adopted by all our commissions, and that to establish any such new rule at the present date by act of Congress, overruling the judicial decisions, would probably have consequences of the most serious character for the United States Government in the future. It would amount to a solemn declaration to the world by the United States Government that if in the future a government shall arbitrarily stop an American vessel and cargo in the pursuit of a lawful voyage, and, after breaking up the voyage, unlawfully appropriate the vessel or cargo to her own use, the obligation of such offending nation would be fully discharged by the allowance of the simple value of the ship and cargo at the time of her departure from the original port, without any addition of premium as additional value added to the cargo by the risks which it incurs or by any addition of freight, which is the amount which the vessel had earned up to the time she was stopped by the unlawful act of the other government. Also, that insurers of a cargo or vessel could not recover the full amount paid by them to the owner of the vessel and by subrogation to his rights for the same, but that the amounts so paid by them must be diminished by the amount of the premium paid.

Is it worth while for the United States Government to scale down awards made to its own citizens and thereby establish for all time a precedent of the utmost inconvenience? Is it not, rather, the highest public policy as well as in accordance with the demands of honesty to satisfy the adjudications of its own courts by the payment of the allowed amounts in full, thus putting ourselves in a strong position should the time ever arise to demand satisfaction from foreign governments for the full amount of damage which they may cause to our own citizens?

Clearly, good faith to our own citizens, as well as the establishment of a proper precedent for future contingencies, demands that the entire amount of damage allowed by the Court of Claims, in accordance with uniform precedents, be appropriated and paid.

I want to discuss very briefly—I have only a very little more to say, Mr. President—some statements made by the committee in the course of its report in regard to certain points of international law.

On page 336, No. 60, schooner Hiram, Ebenezer Barker, master, we are told that—> a doubt naturally arises as to whether or not this vessel, destined for the English settlement at Martinique, which was in rebellion against France, was not smuggling goods into that port or whether the owners of that cargo may not have been Englishmen; or not neutral goods, possibly they may have been contraband.

How an English settlement could have been in rebellion against France is not plain. France and England were at that time in open and bitter warfare. Martinique was actually held by the English and was to all intents and purposes at that date a British possession.

What is meant by "smuggling goods" is not clear. Possibly it means sailing for a blockaded port. If so, the response is clear. At that date, as the Court of Claims has found on elaborate investigation, there was no blockade by the French of any English possession whatever. (See decision of the Court of Claims in the case of the schooner John, 22 C. Cls., 408, 440–454.)

England was at that time the undisputed mistress of the seas. A blockade in order to be binding must be effective; that is, maintained by a sufficient force. France had no naval force by which it would have been possible to maintain for a moment a blockade of any British possession. In the absence of such blockade it was perfectly lawful for the ships of the United States, as for all neutrals, to sail to a British port.

The question whether the owners of the cargo were Englishmen is also immaterial. No claim is made on behalf of the cargo. The American vessel had a perfect right to carry a cargo for an Englishman without subjecting the vessel to capture.

The treaty of 1778 between France and the United States in effect adopted the maxim, "free ships, free goods." (Art. 23 of the treaty, Public Treaties of the United States, 1875, p. 210.) True, the capture was shortly after the date of the act of July 7, 1798 (1 Stat. L., 578), which abrogated the treaties between France and the United States. But even without that treaty and by general principles of international law the utmost that a French vessel could do would be to take the enemy's goods off the vessel and release the vessel.

In the case of the brig William (23 C. Cls., 201), the court allowed the claim of citizens of the United States for the value of the vessel, although it disallowed the claim for the cargo, which was owned by British citizens. Such is the uniform rule of international law.

This same confusion appears at page 351 of the report, where (under No. 80, schooner Little Fanny) it is said:

> This cargo may have belonged to the public enemy of France and to some alien, so far as the record shows. If so, what position would that leave the owner of the vessel in, even though he was an American citizen and his vessel a regular vessel of the United States?

This question is answered by the decision of the Court of Claims in the ship Joanna (24 C. Cls., 198, 208) as follows:

> We conclude that at the time the Joanna was condemned a court, acting under the law of nations, untrammeled by local ordinances, would have ordered the confiscation of the enemy cargo and would have freed the neutral ship with freight money as remuneration, together with compensation for any extra expense which the master might have incurred and which was directly caused by the seizure.

Again, under the heading of the schooner Swan, Samuel Shaw, master, it is stated at page 366 that the vessel was owned by Joseph Prince, an American citizen, and then it is suggested that "the ship may not have been neutral." It is difficult to understand what meaning this statement can have. The ownership of a vessel by a neutral is what makes the ship neutral. The two statements are entirely in conflict.

In St. Clair v. United States (154 U. S., 134, 151) the Supreme Court of the United States said, with reference to this question:

> We are of opinion that the court below did not err in holding that the certificate of the vessel's registry and its carrying the American flag was admissible in evidence and that such evidence made, at least, a prima facie case of proper registry under the laws of the United States and of the nationality of the vessel and its owners. "The purpose of a register," this court has said, "is to declare the nationality of a vessel engaged in trade with foreign nations and to enable her to assert that nationality wherever found. (The Mohawk, 3 Wall., 566, 571.)

Under the case of the schooner Sally, John D. Farley, master, No. 90, page 379, it is stated that the rum of which the cargo consisted was of English manufacture. The cargo was confiscated, but the vessel released. The decision of the court allows freight earnings to the ship, but the committee says at the conclusion:

> This claim does not rest upon a very satisfactory basis.

There could hardly be a clearer claim. Freight earnings, as I have shown, are universally allowed by international courts and commissions where a vessel is carrying a lawful cargo.

See the citation above given from the case of the ship Joanna (24 C. Cls., 198, 208), where it is shown that a neutral vessel carrying even a cargo of enemies' goods was entitled under international law as administered at the end of the last century to release with her freight earnings, the enemies' cargo alone being confiscated. A much more liberal rule was at the date of the particular capture in question in force by treaty between France and the United States.

The twenty-third article of the treaty of 1778 between France and the United States was, at the date of this capture, in full force and effect. This article provided as follows (Public Treaties of the United States, 1875, pp. 209–210):

It shall be lawful for all and singular the subjects of the most Christian King, and the citizens, people, and inhabitants of the said United States, to sail with their ships with all manner of liberty and security, no distinction being made who are the proprietors of the merchandises laden thereon, from any port to the places of those who now are or hereafter shall be at enmity with the most Christian King or the United States. It shall likewise be lawful for the subjects and inhabitants aforesaid to sail with the ships and merchandises aforementioned and to trade with the same liberty and security from the places, ports, and havens of those who are enemies of both or either party, without any opposition or disturbance whatsoever, not only directly from the places of the enemy aforementioned to neutral places, but also from one place belonging to an enemy to another place belonging to an enemy, whether they be under the jurisdiction of the same prince or under several. And it is hereby stipulated that free ships shall also give a freedom to goods, and that everything shall be deemed to be free and exempt which shall be found on board the ships belonging to the subjects of either of the confederates, although the whole lading or any part thereof should appertain to the enemies of either, contraband goods being always excepted. It is also agreed in like manner that the same liberty be extended to persons who are on board a free ship, with this effect, that, although they be enemies to both or either party, they are not to be taken out of that free ship unless they are soldiers and in actual service of the enemies.

The next article, 24 (p. 210), contains a specific description of the goods which shall be contraband and contains another list of the goods which shall not be deemed contraband. Among such goods which are not to be deemed contraband are "beer, wines, and in general all provisions which serve for the nourishment of mankind and the sustenance of life." According to the twenty-fourth article these goods are not contraband, and according to the twenty-third, the American vessel had a perfect right to carry lawful goods, though belonging to an enemy of France. The goods having been most unlawfully and without the shadow of right taken off the vessel, the owner of the vessel was clearly entitled to recover in this proceeding the freight for the carriage of the goods of which he was deprived by the unlawful act of the French authorities.

From what has been shown in regard to the action of a number of the commissions and courts which have passed upon international claims, it will be evident that all items of allowance made by the Court of Claims rest upon ample precedent. Indeed, it may safely be said that if the court had disallowed any one of them, if it had refused to allow the vessel owner his freight for the voyage, if it had refused to allow the premium of insurance as a part of the value added to the goods by the risks which they were to undergo, or if in allowing the underwriter the amount of his insurance paid, it had reduced the amount of his loss by charging the amount of the premium against him, it would have violated every precedent ever laid down by all the commissions and courts which had previously adjudicated upon these subjects. These commissions, as I showed yesterday, were United States commissions, mostly domestic, but some mixed commissions.

Moreover, a reference to the action of these tribunals, as we have referred to them, shows that in several important particulars the Court of Claims has been much less liberal than previous tribunals, in that it has refused to allow such items as the following, which have been allowed by most, if not all, previous tribunals passing upon international claims:

1. Expenses attending the lading of the cargo on board the vessel at the port of departure. None of these expenses of lading have in any case been allowed, while in a number the court has refused to allow them when asked for by the claimants.

2. Premium of insurance "to cover"—that is, the allowance of a fair and usual premium of insurance where the owner did not actually pay such premium to another, but took the whole risk of the voyage on himself.

3. Profits expected to accrue from the voyage.

These have been uniformly disallowed by the Court of Claims. The court has confined its allowances to giving two-thirds of the freight for the actual voyage on which the vessel was engaged when captured.

4. Interest: This is always allowed in international claims as between nation and nation and as much as it is in a domestic admiralty court between party and party.

Of course, no one supposes that a restoration of the principal sum allowed by the Court of Claims in any of these cases after the lapse of 100 years to the next of kin of the original sufferers comes anywhere near being a compensation for the loss. Interest would have to be added to make it approximately just compensation. Interest not being allowed, why should the failure to do full justice be aggravated by cutting out the items which the Court of Claims has allowed?

It is submitted that instead of seeking for a mode of cutting down these claims to the smallest possible amount, the principle ought to be maintained which is thus quoted from a high authority in Ralston, International Arbitral Law and Procedure, section 353, page 172:

In the Orr and Laubenheimer case (Foreign Relations of 1909, 826) the arbitrator between the United States and Nicaragua said that where property had been taken for the public welfare "it seems to me right that the benefit of doubt should be thrown in favor of the individual, and that his damages should be liberally estimated lest by any error he should be oppressed."

The very impossibility that both Houses of Congress should examine all the details of these claims and the internal evidence afforded by the report of the Committee on Claims that they have not been looked into, shows the wisdom of the original provision of law referring these claims to the Court of Claims for conclusions of both fact and law. It is essential to the orderly administration of justice that the findings of the court should be accepted by Congress as a basis for its action as regards the amounts to be allowed. They certainly have been accepted as a basis for disallowing all those claims which the Court of Claims has thrown out.

I shall ask leave to have printed a list of payments already made and of precedents in Congress for action on these claims.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). Without objection it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PRECEDENTS IN CONGRESS.

Congress has heretofore by appropriations allowed the following amounts:

Mar. 3, 1891, 26 Stat. L., 897 (51st Cong.)	$1,304,095.37
Mar. 3, 1899, 30 Stat. L., 1161 (56th Cong.)	1,055,473.04
May 27, 1902, 32 Stat. L., 207 (57th Cong)	798,631.27
Feb. 24, 1905, 33 Stat. L., 743 (58th Cong.)	752,669.93
Total	3,910,869.61

All of these allowances include items of the same character as those which it would appear that the committee contemplates striking out. After the vast majority of these claims are now paid, the ground ought not to be shifted and a question for the first time raised as to the character of the items.

The recommendation made by the President in his message of December 21, 1911 (H. Doc. No. 343, 62d Cong., 2d sess., pp. 15, 16), is fully justified and should be followed:

FRENCH SPOLIATION AWARDS.

"In my last message I recommended to Congress that it authorize the payment of the findings or judgments of the Court of Claims in the matter of the French spoliation cases. There has been no appropriation to pay these judgments since 1905. The findings and awards were obtained after a very bitter fight, the Government succeeding in about 75 per cent of the cases. The amount of the awards ought, as a matter of good faith on the part of the Government, to be paid."

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask for a vote on the pending amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. LODGE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Newlands	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Gronna	O'Gorman	Smith, Md.
Borah	Hitchcock	Oliver	Smoot
Bradley	Jones	Page	Stephenson
Brandegee	Kenyon	Penrose	Swanson
Bristow	Kern	Perkins	Thornton
Bryan	La Follette	Perky	Townsend
Catron	Lippitt	Richardson	Warren
Chamberlain	Lodge	Root	Wetmore
Clark, Wyo.	Martin, Va.	Sanders
Crawford	Martine, N. J.	Shively
Fletcher	Myers	Simmons

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is absent on business of the Senate. I should like to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. KERN. I again announce that the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Senate on account of the death of his son.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is absent from the city on important business.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama] is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names, not a quorum. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the list of absentees, and Mr. FOSTER, Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. PAYNTER, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. MCLEAN, Mr. CLAPP, Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. BROWN, and Mr. WORKS responded to their names.

Mr. PAYNTER. I should like to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] is ill and is absent on that account.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as very few Senators have heard the debate, I merely wish to say that the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota to my amendment cuts down the allowances of the Court of Claims as provided for in my amendment. My amendment simply provides for the payment of the allowances made by the Court of Claims in each case. For various reasons in various cases the Senator from South Dakota proposes to reduce these allowances. I do not think they ought to be reduced, and I have on that account opposed the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BRISTOW. As I understand, the amendment upon which we are now to vote reduces the amount of the French spoliation claims which the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts carries. I do not believe any of these claims ought to be paid, and I intend to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts; but since the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota reduces the amount, I shall vote for it, because it cuts out what I do not think ought to be allowed.

Mr. BORAH. How much is the reduction in the claims?

Mr. CRAWFORD. About $270,000.

Mr. BORAH. How much does it leave?

Mr. CRAWFORD. About six hundred-odd thousand dollars. It simply cuts out of the amendment the premiums on the insurance and also the freight charges. It allows the actual property loss.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would like to ask the Senator from South Dakota whether the parts of these claims which he proposes to strike out were not allowed by the Court of Claims?

Mr. CRAWFORD. They were allowed as other items were allowed; that is, they found that the freight earnings in such a case, for instance in the case of the ship Liberty, were so much and the amount paid for premiums were so much; they found as a conclusion of law a liability on the part of the French Government for those premiums and freight earnings.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator, further, as to what amount of claims in total has been paid by the National Government?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I would only be able to say offhand, because they have run through several appropriation bills, but I would say $2,000,000 or $3,000,000.

Mr. LODGE. I this morning gave the exact figures to the reporter, although I did not read them. About $4,000,000 has already been paid on these claims.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask what amount remains unpaid?

Mr. CRAWFORD. So far as concern the findings in this bill, they amount to $942,000. Back of that are some incorporated insurance companies claims.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask further, whether the Court of Claims has not very nearly reached a finality in the liability of the National Government under the French spoliation arrangement.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I can only say that occasionally a straggling case comes from that court, but apparently the list is about run out.

Mr. NEWLANDS. About run out?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator, further, whether he does not think the National Government is getting off very cheaply under this obligation to France to pay her obligations regarding these American claims?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I do not care to detain the Senate with an expression of opinion about that—as to the merits of these claims. I have a very positive opinion that there is merit in them. I at one time expressed that opinion with a good deal of emphasis. I have not changed my mind about it. But, as I said the other day, the Committee on Claims, of which I am a member, considered that it was not wise to place the French spoliation claims upon this bill as an amendment, because the very sharp and positive differences of views in regard to those claims, not only in this body but in the other branch of Congress, would mean the absolute defeat of this bill.

I joined with my associates, after the majority so decided, in a report that left out the French spoliation claims, and on that account I propose to stand with that committee. But I ask that the matter be disposed of one way or the other. We can not keep the omnibus claims bill here in the position of obstructing other business and monopolizing the attention of the Senate. I think we already have given a good deal of attention to it and I ask that it be disposed of one way or the other.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I join with the Senator from South Dakota in a desire for a speedy determination of this matter, and it is not my intention to extend my remarks upon this bill at any length.

I simply wish to say that those who have inquired into the operations of the Court of Claims must realize how small a portion of the claims that are made against the United States Government pass that body and how thorough is the sifting process of that tribunal.

I wish also to say that it is utterly impossible for the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives to sit as a reviewing court upon all these claims that pass the Court of Claims. Time itself would not permit such a thorough inquiry into the facts and circumstances relating to these claims and the judgments rendered upon them as to permit the Congress of the United States, without a sacrifice of its duty in other directions, to inquire into all the niceties of these questions.

We know as a matter of fact that the shipping of the United States was the victim of serious ravages by France. We all know as a matter of history that the losses inflicted upon American shipping were very large. We all know that the United States Government by solemn treaty assumed the obligation that France had to respond to the United States in damages. And we know that if the United States Government were to-day pressing the claims of its citizens against the French Government for the recovery of these amounts, the United States Government would be pressing for the very sums which are now under question here, and pressing them with all the power of the Government behind them, as a matter of justice and of right to American citizens.

Now, then, we all know as a matter of history that the damage inflicted upon American shipping far exceeded $5,000,000. We know that already only four millions have been paid; that this bill provides for only $800,000 or $900,000 more; that we have very nearly reached the limit of these claims. Why should we halt now?

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to speak for only a few moments, but I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will permit me, I simply wish to express the hope that we may reach a vote before 1 o'clock. I do not think a roll call will be demanded on the amendment to the amendment, and I only hope we may have an opportunity to vote on that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will yield the floor to the Senator in one moment.

We have organized a court for the purpose of inquiring into and ascertaining the facts, and there is no reason to suspect either the integrity or the efficiency of that court. These inquiries involve matters concerning which it is utterly impossible for the Congress of the United States, as a reviewing court, to give the consideration which they deserve, and as a matter of history we know that these claims must have amounted to more than $5,000,000, and there is no present possibility of their much exceeding that amount. It seems to me that as a matter of justice and right we ought to validate by an appropriation the judgment of the courts which the Government itself has appointed for the purpose of determining the validity of claims against it.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I am sorry to disappoint the chairman of the committee, but I am somewhat interested in these claims, and I should like to have them paid. I am afraid that the desire of the chairman to get to a vote before 1 o'clock is accompanied by a lack of desire to have the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts adopted.

I have not studied the subject as I probably ought to have studied it, Mr. President, but for a great many years I have had a strong impression derived from many sources that it was quite discreditable to the Government of the United States that these claims were not paid. It has seemed to me that they were illustrations of a general rule that the worse a claim was the less substance there was in it, and the more the claimant could afford to pay out of it to have it pushed the better was its chance. I have known good people, poor people, earning their daily bread by their daily work, living through their lives with the faint hope before them of the payment of one of these French spoliation claims.

I should like now to ask the chairman of the committee whether the fact that so large a part of these claims has already been paid does not create a situation in which we should regard the principle as settled. Now, is that not sound?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will simply say to the Senator from New York that we face a situation and conditions here where it is a question of advisability as to whether or not the claims bill which passed the House shall include the French spoliation claims.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, under the order previously adopted the Senate will resume its session as a court.

Mr. CLAPP. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cullom	Lodge	Sanders
Bacon	Cummins	McLean	Shively
Bankhead	Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	du Pont	Martine, N. J.	Smoot

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll of the Senate 61 Senators have responded to their names, and a quorum of the Senate is present.

IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. BACON) having announced that the time had arrived for the consideration of the articles of impeachment against Robert W. Archbald, the respondent appeared with his counsel, Mr. Worthington, Mr. Simpson, Mr. Robert W. Archbald, jr., and Mr. Martin.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives appeared in the seats provided for them.

The Sergeant at Arms made the usual proclamation.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the following order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be read.

The order was read, as follows:

Ordered, That the time for final arguments in the trial of impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States, shall be limited to three days from and including January 8, 1913, and shall be divided equally between the managers on the part of the House of Representatives and the counsel for the respondent, the time thus assigned to each side to be divided as each side may for itself determine.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, I would ask the consent of the Senate, before the further consideration of that order, to make a correctoon in the RECORD of yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be reached in its order, the Chair takes the liberty to suggest to the manager.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. The manager cheerfully accepts the suggestion of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal has not yet been read. The question is on the adoption of the order presented by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to inquire if that is agreeable to counsel on both sides.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, I may say it is entirely agreeable to counsel for the respondent. We have had some conference with the managers about it, and we understand that all the managers who are to speak except the one who is to make the closing argument will speak before we begin.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. The respondent's counsel may not give himself any uneasiness on that score, Mr. President, for I have repeatedly told him in private conversation, and I think I have repeated it on the floor of the Senate, that I thought it was fair and right that the managers should have only one speech in conclusion. So the suggestion of the respondent's counsel seems to me to be inappropriable on this occasion.

Now, Mr. President, if I understood the reading of that order, it set three days. That was not our understanding of the order yesterday. Perhaps it can be or is susceptible, and will be so construed, as to harmonize with our understanding of that order.

The managers acted upon the belief in their conference this morning that the Senate was to meet at the hour of 1 o'clock each day and was to hold a session daily for three days until the hour of 6 on each day, making 15 hours of time for the arguments of this case, one-half of which should be controlled by the managers and one-half of which should be controlled by the respondent's counsel.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The manager will permit the Chair to state that the order fixing the hours from 1 to 6 has been previously adopted by the Senate.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. It was not made specifically a part of the order of 15 hours.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was so done this morning, by order of the Senate.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. The manager was not present when that action of the Senate was had, therefore, Mr. President, the manager thought it was incumbent upon him to have a perfect understanding of this matter before any discussion should arise in regard to the adoption of this order or before the order itself should be adopted, if it be adopted without discussion.

Now, Mr. President, in view of the statement the Chair has made, and which coincides with the understanding the managers had of the action of the Senate on yesterday when it went into private session to consider this matter, I am authorized by my associates to say that the order of the Senate having been agreed upon in the session I have referred to, and having met the views which are authorized by the sound discretion of the Senate, meets with no objection on the part of the managers, and they cheerfully acquiesce in that order and hope the Senate will adopt it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the order submitted by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. As many as favor it will say "aye." [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the order is adopted. The Secretary will read the Journal of the last session of the Senate sitting as a court.

The Secretary read the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate sitting as a court of Tuesday, January 7, 1913.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I called attention to a slight error in the RECORD this morning, which, I suppose, will be sufficient for the correction of the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there any inaccuracies in the Journal? If not, it will stand approved. The manager will now present the matter of correction to which he referred.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, on page 1333 of the testimony printed in the pamphlet form, about the middle of the page, the witness, Mr. C. G. Boland, was under examination, and in response to a question he said:

I did. And he then dictated to a stenographer, I think, that statement, which he believed was sufficient to satisfy Mr. Watson that he would be paid $5,000 in the event of his disposing of the property. I presented it to Mr. Watson, and he declined it.

Mr. Boland, as all the managers remember, and as the witness himself tells us this morning, said:

I presented it to Mr. Watson, and he accepted it.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. We agree to that.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. We wish that the word "declined" be stricken out and the word "accepted" be substituted.

And, Mr. President, may I say that I think the reports made in this case by the stenographers of the Senate have been unusually accurate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The correction will be made as suggested by the manager.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, following the precedent established in the last impeachment trial, I offer the following order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That any of the managers or counsel for the respondent having all or any portion of his argument in manuscript may deliver a copy of the same to the reporter or any portion thereof, which for lack of time or to save the time of the Senate the managers or counsel shall omit to deliver or read, and the same shall be incorporated by the reporter as a part of the argument delivered; and any manager or counsel who does not address the court may file and have printed as a part of the proceedings an argument before the close of the discussion.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming if it is not contrary to the established rule of the Senate to have matter printed that has not been delivered before the body.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I said, in offering the order, that it was according to the precedent in impeachment cases. It is contrary to the ordinary rule of the Senate, but it is a proceeding which has been followed in impeachment trials in order to save the time of the Senate and preserve the record.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not approve of that policy, Mr. President, but I will not object under the circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the order just presented by the Senator from Wyoming. As many as favor it will say "aye," opposed "no." [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the order is adopted by the Senate. The managers will proceed, if they are ready to present their case.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, as I understand it, 15 hours were accorded to this discussion. It is now, I believe, 16 minutes after the hour of 1 o'clock. I think it is important to make that statement. Mr. Manager STERLING will make the opening argument on behalf of the managers of the House of Representatives ARGUMENT OF MR. STERLING, ONE OF THE MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. Manager STERLING. Mr. President, the managers on the part of the House approach the argument in this case with much confidence. They believe that the record which has been made proves the charges set forth in the articles of impeachment, and that those charges constitute impeachable offenses. I think it is plain, from the statement made by counsel for respondent in the beginning of this trial and from the brief which was filed and printed some days ago, that they rely for acquittal on the single proposition that these offenses do not constitute impeachable offenses for the reason that, as they claim, they do not constitute indictable offenses.

In their brief counsel for the respondent lay down, as the first proposition, that no offense is impeachable unless it is indictable; and, as a second proposition, and the only other proposition that they submit, is that if the offense in order to be impeachable need not be indictable it must at least be of a criminal nature.

As to the first proposition, the contention of counsel for the respondent is not sustained either by the language of the Constitution, by the decisions of the Senate in former impeachment cases, by the decisions of other tribunals in this country which have tried impeachment cases, or by the decisions of the English Parliament; nor is that contention sustained, so far as I have been able to read the authorities and the law writers on constitutional law, by a single American writer. The language of the Constitution, so far as it relates to the trial of this case, is this:

> The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments.
> * * * * * * *
> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

I have stated all the language of the Constitution with which the Senate has to deal in determining the case now before it. I ask the Senate to consider that nowhere in that language is there any limitation as to the nature or extent of the crimes, misdemeanors, and misbehaviors in office. The Constitution does not undertake to define those terms with reference to the jurisdiction of the Senate in removing public officers for the violation of those provisions of that instrument, nor does it limit the time as to the commission of these offenses. It does not provide that the offenses shall be committed during the service from which it is sought to remove him, nor does it limit Congress as to when it may proceed to impeach and try an offending servant. Under the plain language of the Constitution the House of Representatives has the power to impeach and the Senate has the power to try and convict for offenses of the character described in the Constitution, let them have been committed at any time during the term of office from which the respondent is sought to be removed, during his service in some other office, or during some other term, or for offenses committed before he became an officer of the United States and while he was a private citizen.

If the Constitution puts no limitation on the House of Representatives or the Senate as to what constitutes these crimes, misdemeanors, and misbehaviors, where shall we go to find the limitations? There is no law, statutory nor common law, which puts limitations on or makes definitions for the crimes, misdemeanors, and misbehaviors which subject to impeachment and conviction.

It will not be maintained either by the managers or by the counsel for the respondent that precedents bind, and yet we may well consider them because they are so uniform on the question as to what constitutes impeachable offenses. The decisions of the Senate of the United States, of the various State tribunals which have jurisdiction over impeachment cases, and of the Parliament of England all agree that an offense, in order to be impeachable, need not be indictable either at common law or under any statute.

I shall not weary the Senate with reading the history of impeachment cases, but I do desire to read briefly from some of the law writers of this country, giving their conclusions as to what constitute impeachable offenses after they had reviewed and considered cases that have been tried in the Senate and in other forums where impeachment cases have been tried.

I read first from Tucker on the Constitution. On page 416 I find this:

> (c) High crimes and misdemeanors. What is the meaning of these terms? Much controversy has arisen out of this question. Do these words refer only to offenses for which the party may be indicted under the authority of the United States? Do they mean offenses by the common law? Do they include offenses against the laws of the States, or do they mean offenses for which there is no indictment in the ordinary courts of justice? Or do they include maladministration, unconstitutional action of an officer willful or mistaken, or illegal action willful or mistaken.

And then, under the subject of "bribery," the author says this:

> (e) So in respect to bribery. Bribery corrupts public duty. The difference between treason and bribery is that the first is a crime defined by the Constitution, as to which Congress has no power except to declare its punishment. Bribery is not a constitutional crime, and was not made a crime against the United States by statute until April, 1790. These two cases, therefore, show that the words "high crimes and misdemeanors" can not be confined to crimes created and defined by a statute of the United States; for if Congress had ever failed to have fixed a punishment for the constitutional crime of treason, or had failed to pass an act in reference to the crime of bribery, as it did fail for more than a year after the Constitution went into operation, it would result that no officer would be impeachable for either crime, because Congress had failed to pass the needful statutes defining crime in the case of bribery, and prescribing the punishment in the case of treason as well as bribery. It can hardly be supposed that the Constitution intended to make impeachment for these two flagrant crimes depend upon the action of Congress. The conclusion from this would seem to be inevitable that treason and bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors, in respect to which Congress had failed to legislate, would still be within the jurisdiction of the process of impeachment.

I read now from the brief filed by Mr. Manager CLAYTON, in which he quotes from Watson on the Constitution:

> A civil officer may so behave in public as to bring disgrace upon himself and shame upon his country, and he may continue to do this until his name would become a national stench, and yet he would not be subject to indictment by any law of the United States, but he certainly could be impeached. What will those who advocate the doctrine that impeachment will not lie except for an offense punishable by statute do with the constitutional provision relative to judges which says, "Judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior"? This means that as long as they behave themselves their tenure of office is fixed, and they can not be disturbed. But suppose they cease to behave themselves? When the Constitution says, "A judge shall hold his office during good behavior," it means that he shall not hold it when it ceases to be good. Suppose he should refuse to sit upon the bench and discharge the duties which the Constitution and the law enjoin upon him, or should become a notoriously corrupt character, and live a notoriously corrupt and debauched life? He could not be indicted for such conduct, and he could not be removed except by impeachment. Would it be claimed that impeachment would not be the proper remedy in such a case?

I now read what Cooley—who, I think, is recognized as one of the greatest constitutional law writers of America—says briefly on this subject. I read from his Principles of Constitutional Law, page 178:

> The offenses for which the President or any other officer may be impeached are any such as in the opinion of the House are deserving of punishment under that process. They are not necessarily offenses against the general laws. In the history of England, where the like proceeding obtains, the offenses have often been political, and in some cases for gross betrayal of public interests punishment has very justly been inflicted on cabinet officers. It is often found that offenses of a very serious nature by high officers are not offenses against the criminal code, but consist in abuses or betrayals of trust, or inexcusable neglects of duty, which are dangerous and criminal because of the immense interests involved, and the greatness of the trust which has not been kept. Such cases must be left to be dealt with on their own facts, and judged according to their apparent deserts.

Mr. President, the following is from volume 15 of the American and English Encyclopedia of Law, paragraph 2, page 1066:

> The Constitution of the United States provides that the President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. If impeachment in England be regarded merely as a mode of trial for the punishment of common-law or statutory crimes, and if the Constitution has adopted it only as a mode of procedure, leaving the crimes to which it is to be applied to be settled by the general rules of criminal law, then, as it is well settled that in regard to the National Government there are no common-law crimes, it would seem necessarily to follow that impeachment can be instituted only for crimes specifically named in the Constitution or for offenses declared to be crimes by Federal statute. This view has been maintained by very eminent authority, but the cases of impeachment that have been brought under the Constitution would seem to give to the remedy a much wider scope than the above rule would indicate. In each of the only two cases of impeachment tried by the Senate in which a conviction resulted the defendant was found guilty of offenses not indictable either at common law or under any Federal statute, and in almost every case brought offenses were charged in the articles of impeachment which were not indictable under any Federal statute and in several cases they were such as constituted neither a statutory nor a common-law crime. The impeachability of the offenses charged in the articles was in most of the cases not denied. In one case, however, counsel for the defendant insisted that impeachment would not lie for any but an indictable offense; but after exhaustive argument on both sides this defense was practically abandoned. The cases, then, seem to establish that impeachment is not a mere mode of procedure for the punishment of indictable crimes, that the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" is to be taken not in its common-law but in its broader parliamentary sense, and is to be interpreted in the light of parliamentary usage; that in this sense it includes not only crimes for which an indictment may be brought, but grave political offenses, corruption, maladministration, or neglect of duty involving moral turpitude, arbitrary and oppressive conduct, and even gross improprieties, by judges and high officers of state, although such offenses be not of a character to render the offender liable to an indictment either at common law or under any statute. Additional weight is added to this interpretation of the Constitution by the opinions of eminent writers on constitutional and parliamentary law and by the fact that some of the most distinguished members of the convention that framed it have thus interpreted it.

Mr. President, at the suggestion of Manager Clayton, I will read from the brief which he filed and in which he quotes from Bouvier's Law Dictionary:

"The offenses for which a guilty officer may be impeached are treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors. (Art. II, sec. 4.) The Constitution defines the crime of treason. (Art. III, sec. 3.) Recourse must be had to the common law for a definition of bribery. Not having particularly mentioned what is to be understood by 'other high crimes and misdemeanors,' resort, it is presumed, must be had to parliamentary practice and the common law in order to ascertain what they are. (Story, Const., par. 795.) It is said that impeachment may be brought to bear on any offense against the Constitution or the laws which is deserving of punishment in this manner or is of such a character as to render the officer unfit to hold his office. It is primarily directed against official misconduct, and is not restricted to political crimes alone. The decision rests really with the Senate. (Black, Const. L., 121.)"

And so, Mr. President, I say, that outside of the language of the Constitution, which I quoted, there is no law which binds the Senate in this case to-day except that law which is prescribed by their own conscience, and on that, and on that alone, must depend the result of this trial. Each Senator must fix his own standard; and the result of this trial depends upon whether or not these offenses we have charged against Judge Archbald come within the law laid down by the conscience of each Senator for himself.

I shall leave the further discussion of any legal propositions involved in the case to my associate managers, some of whom I know are much better prepared than I to discuss them, and I invite the attention of the Senators to facts which we believe we have proven in this case, and which, as I said at the beginning, we feel, confidently, constitute crimes for which Judge Archbald should be removed from office under the law as it is laid down in the Constitution and under the law which the Senate will lay down for themselves.

The first offense charged in the articles of impeachment is that Judge Archbald used his official power and influence to prevail on the Erie Railroad Co. and its officials to sell to him and to one E. J. Williams the Katydid culm dump. Briefly, the history of the facts in that case are these:

E. J. Williams went to Judge Archbald in March, 1911, and told him of the Katydid culm dump, and said to him that an option could be had on the interest owned by Robertson & Law, who had worked the Katydid colliery, and that he thought that if an option could be had from the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., which was a subsidiary corporation to the Erie Railroad Co., that the Katydid might be sold at a profit. There is not any question, either in the testimony offered by the managers or by the respondent, or in the testimony of the respondent himself, that Mr. Williams and Judge Archbald were each to share equally in whatever profits came from the transaction.

Now, what did Judge Archbald do? He first wrote a letter to Capt. May, the superintendent of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. He says that Williams's first request to him was for a letter of introduction. But he did not get a letter of introduction. Several conversations were had in subsequent days, before the 31st day of March, in which it finally developed that Judge Archbald gave a letter to Mr. Williams to take to Mr. May, in which he simply asked Mr. May if the Katydid culm dump was for sale; and if so, to fix a price. It was during those two days that Mr. Williams and Judge Archbald agreed to share these profits. The evidence of Judge Archbald himself is very plain that he declined to give Williams the letter of introduction until Williams had reached the point where he was willing to divide the profits with Judge Archbald in the Katydid culm dump in order to secure the judge's influence, and when in the conversations they had come to that understanding, Judge Archbald wrote this letter, the first step in his effort to influence the railroad company to sell them this dump.

Williams did not succeed. He returned to Judge Archbald and said to him that Capt. May would not talk to him about it; that he was cross and did not seem to want to talk to him about it. And then some time in June Judge Archbald said to Williams, "I will go and see Brownell." Mr. Brownell lived in New York and was vice president of the Erie Railroad Co. Judge Archbald said, "I will go and see Brownell," and he said to Williams, "I have some cases here on my desk now for the Erie Railroad Co"; and Williams said that he (Judge Archbald) said, "I might be able to hurt them for refusing so little a thing as that."

There is some truth, I know, in the testimony of Williams regarding that incident, because Williams said that when he referred to the cases against the Erie Railroad Co. that were on his desk at that time Judge Archbald spoke of one of them as the Lighterage case. It is true that Williams here on the witness stand undertook to say that he saw the word "lighterage" on the back of the briefs. That was not true, because we brought here before the Senate every brief and every printed document in these cases, and the word "lighterage" does not appear anywhere on the back of any of the briefs. And mark, the word "lighterage" appears just in one instance, and that is in the court calendar that was printed for the October term, which had not come to Judge Archbald's desk at that time.

How is it possible for this man Williams to have known anything about the Lighterage cases? He knew nothing about lighterage, and it must have come from Judge Archbald; and when Judge Archbald was asked how it was possible for Williams to have known anything about the Lighterage cases except through him he undertook to say that he might guess that it came from William P. Boland. All the evidence that there is in this case on that point is to the effect that Williams himself told William P. Boland about the Lighterage case instead of Boland telling him about the case. And I believe absolutely, just as Williams stated here, that Judge Archbald did refer to the records of these cases on his desk and say, "Here I have some cases against the Erie Railroad Co. for consideration now," and made some explanation of what is known as the Lighterage case. He did go to New York. On the 4th day of August he went into the office of Mr. Brownell, the vice president and general counsel of the Erie Railroad Co., and, as he undertakes to say, he said to Mr. Brownell, as his reason for coming there, that he wanted to inquire about the title to the Katydid culm dump.

But Mr. Brownell knew nothing about the title to the Katydid culm dump and he referred the matter to Mr. Richardson, who was the legal representative neither of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. nor of the Erie Railroad Co. He went to New York, and his own detailing of the conversation that occurred with Brownell and Richardson is to the effect that he went there for the purpose of influencing those railroad officials to direct or command Capt. May, of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., to sell him the Katydid culm dump. Let us see how he succeeded.

But suppose he had not succeeded. Would that be an excuse for the offense charged in this count? Suppose he had sought to impress upon them that here was a judge of the Commerce Court seeking to buy the property of the railroad company and he had failed in his attempt to influence them. Judge Archbald has already committed this offense. So far as he is concerned, he has sought to use his influence as a judge to impel this railroad company to part with its property. But he did succeed. Mark, that Mr. Richardson said that he would take the matter up with Capt. May and that he would hear from them later. On the 25th day of August Capt. May was in New York, and Mr. Richardson gave him direction to sell this property to Judge Archbald and Mr. Williams. He returned to Scranton on the 26th day of August, and on the 29th, meeting Judge Archbald on the street, said to him, "You tell Mr. Williams to come and I will give him an option on the Katydid." In the meantime, from the hour that Judge Archbald says he was in New York to see Mr. Brownell about the state of the title to the Katydid culm dump, nothing had been done by May, nothing had been done by Richardson, Brownell, or Archbald to change the state of that title, nothing had been done to correct or improve the title; but on the 29th day of August, 1911, they make this option to Mr. Williams and Judge Archbald.

It is very evident from the course of counsel for the respondent in this case that they will argue to the Senate that we have not proven any intent on the part of Judge Archbald to corruptly influence the railroad company to sell him the Katydid culm dump. Every lawyer within the sound of my voice recognizes that it is not possible for the prosecution in any case to prove by direct testimony the intent of the accused.

The law everywhere provides that the intent must be inferred from the acts and the conduct of the accused, and the law will imply and presume that he intended the reasonable and natural consequences of his own act. And what are the reasonable and natural consequences of the act of Judge Archbald with reference to his relations to the railroad company and the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. in this transaction? Does it not naturally follow that a judge of the Commerce Court, which has jurisdiction over interstate railroads, going to these railroad companies and demanding of them a favor, is more likely to get it than a private citizen who appeals to them for similar favors? It is the natural result of his act that they should accede to his request rather than to that of a man who did not hold a position on the Commerce Court.

But let me say now—and the same thing applies to other charges in this impeachment—that the Erie Railroad Co., the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co., and the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. had litigation then pending in the Commerce Court and that Judge Archbald at the time of the Katydid transaction had these cases on his desk for consideration.

Oh, counsel may argue that it was only an inference that Judge Archbald sought to use this power to influence the Erie Railroad Co., and that there is no evidence in this case that the mere fact that he was a judge of the Commerce Court did persuade them to part with their property. We know from the testimony of both May and Richardson that it was against the policy of the Erie Railroad to sell its coal properties of any kind. But they did sell in this instance, and they sold it after Judge Archbald had gone to see the high officials of the company and importuned them to let them have it.

But suppose he did not intend that his official position should affect their conduct. Let us imagine, if it is possible to do so, that Judge Archbald was so innocent and so guileless that it never occurred to him that his official position might have some effect on these litigants in his court. The effect of these transactions is just the same, and if a judge so conducts himself or commits acts, even without intent to do wrong, and thereby shakes the public confidence in the judiciary of the country and brings his high office into disrepute, he ought to be impeached and removed from office.

The evil of all these cases does not consist merely in Judge Archbald making a profit by the use of his official power. That is not the great evil which comes to the people of the country by reason of his conduct. The greatest evil from conduct such as his lies in the fact that it disturbs the public mind and shakes the faith of the people in American institutions; and when the faith of the people in American institutions is shaken it is impossble for them to endure.

Counsel for respondent has offered in this case much evidence as to the value of the Katydid culm dump. Page after page is devoted to that end, and their excuse for doing so is because we called Mr. Rittenhouse, who had made a survey of the dump and had estimated its value and given it to the Department of Justice during the preliminary investigation of this case. We never offered the report of Mr. Rittenhouse because we felt that the question of value was material to the issue in this first count, nor is it material now as to whether the Katydid culm dump was worth more or less than what Williams and Archbald agreed to pay for it, the sum of $8,000. It was worth much more. The testimony of Rittenhouse, who investigated it for the Department of Justice; the testimony of the engineer, Saum, who investigated and tested it for the Du Pont Powder Co., and the report of Mr. Merriam, the engineer for the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., who before his death had investigated it, all found that there were from 50,000 to 55,000 tons of coal in the Katydid culm dump.

But, as I said, that is not material to the issue. The question is, What was the frame of mind on that question which Judge Archbald entertained when he was seeking to buy it? What did he think it was worth? If he believed that he could influence the railroad company to sell to him for $8,000 and, after buying it for that price, that he could sell it for a profit, that is the question in the case, and that is the motive that prompted him to use his power as a judge to get this property.

Judge Archbald was right about it. He knew—or, at least, relying on Williams he knew—that he was getting it at a bargain, because within 60 days they had sold it for $20,000, a profit of $12,000, which was to be divided equally between Williams and Archbald. Williams did not put in a dollar. He did not have any money to put in it. Archbald did not put in a dollar. The capital that those two men employed to get that property was this: Williams's experience as a coal-dump finder; he found the dump; and Judge Archbald offset that capital of Mr. Williams with his influence with the railroad company. Williams's experience and Archbald's influence—there was the partnership, and with that as their capital they started into the coal business on equal terms and equal footing and agreed to divide the profits equally.

When counsel for respondent, Mr. Worthington, made his opening statement in this case he talked much about the conspiracy of the Bolands to destroy Judge Archbald, and he undertook to set up as a defense to the offenses of Judge Archbald that the Bolands, and especially William P. Boland, had undertaken and set out resolutely to destroy the judge. Now, suppose that all he said about it was true. Suppose there was a conspiracy existing between the Bolands and others to destroy Judge Archbald. What did they do? Did the Bolands manufacture any testimony against Judge Archbald? Did they turn a hand or say a word or enter into any agreement with anybody for the purpose of manufacturing testimony against Judge Archbald?

It is true that William P. Boland, when Williams brought him one of the letters that Judge Archbald had written, took a photograph of it. But what if he did? The judge wrote the letter. Suppose W. P. Boland did suggest to Williams to have Judge Archbald go to New York to see Brownell. Judge Archbald went. Suppose Boland did suggest to Williams that he have Judge Archbald write the letter to Capt. May for this dump. Judge Archbald wrote it. Suppose Williams and William P. Boland together did jointly dictate the silent-party agreement, in which they agreed to give Archbald an interest in this culm dump. Archbald accepted it.

Now, what else has William P. Boland or either of the Bolands done on which these gentlemen can charge a conspiracy? That is all they did. It may be that William P. Boland, rightfully or wrongfully, it is not for me and it is not for the Senate to say, did start out to get evidence against Judge Archbald in this case. He got it, and in so doing he rendered a valuable public service.

Ah, what a pitiable spectacle this presents; counsel for the respondent, a high judicial officer of the United States, coming into the Senate and pleading that the Bolands had duped and deceived him into doing things which scandalized the high office which he held.

Now, Mr. President, to call the attention of the Senate to the second article, which relates to the Marian Coal Co. transaction. The Marian Coal Co. was a corporation doing business near Scranton in the way of washing coal from one of the coal dumps which had been formed there in some mining operation. The Bolands owned two-thirds of the stock of the Marian Coal Co., and they had been involved in litigation in the district court at Scranton and in the Interstate Commerce Commission. This man Williams suggested to the Bolands one day that he thought George M. Watson, an attorney at Scranton, could get a settlement of all their difficulties and sell this Marian Coal Co. to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad.

Now, it was the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. that was a defendant in the Interstate Commerce Commission in the suit which the Marian Coal Co. had there pending, and this same railroad was a party defendant also in those two cases, No. 38 and No. 39, in which the Erie Railroad Co. was a party, and which were pending at this time in the Commerce Court and about which Judge Archbald said, "I have here on my desk now two cases against the Erie Railroad Co." The Delaware, Lackawanna & Western was in both those cases.

I do not know how it was, and I suppose it will never be known how it happened that George Watson immediately after the Bolands had employed him went direct to the office of Judge Archbald to get Judge Archbald to intercede for him in carrying out the matters for which he had been employed by the Marian Coal Co. After he had talked with Judge Archbald they called Christy Boland over to the office.

It is true Judge Archbald says he does not remember anything about that incident, but I believe that Christy Boland is telling the exact truth when he says that the next day, I think it was, after they had employed Watson, he was called to the office of Judge Archbald, where he found Judge Archbald and Mr. Watson in consultation, and that the judge said, "Now, I understand the agreement to be that you have employed George Watson to settle your difficulties for $100,000 and that you are to give him a $5,000 fee."

That was the testimony which was elicited last evening from Mr. Christy Boland after he was called back on the witness stand. I thought it was in the record on the first examination. I knew that Christy Boland had testified to that fact before the Judiciary Committee. So we called him back to prove it before the Senate, and he testified here as he testified before the House committee that that statement was made there in Judge Archbald's office when those three persons were present.

I think that is extremely important, because Judge Archbald at that time said he would assist Mr. Watson all he could in the settlement of these transactions, and he knew that Watson had started out and had been employed with authority to settle it for $100,000.

Judge Archbald went to New York, or I will put it just as charitably as I can. I will say that he was in New York, as he insisted it should be stated. It does not make any difference. He was in New York, he says, holding criminal court, and while there he went to the office of Mr. Loomis on the 4th day of August.

Now mark, the 4th day of August was a red-letter day for Judge Archbald in the coal business. He not only went to Brownell and started the transaction with him to buy the Katydid culm dump, but he went to Loomis on the same day, in order to prevail on him to see Watson, with a view of settling the Marian Coal Co.'s difficulties. Loomis, after he had seen him, tells him he will have his people take it up with Mr. Watson and see what can be done. But nothing is done.

A little later Judge Archbald sees Loomis in the city of Scranton and reminds him of the matter again, and urges him to take it up with Watson. He also calls Mr. Phillips over to his house, sends for him by telephone, and urges the negotiations along.

Now, Phillips was the superintendent of the coal properties of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. After a consultation there Mr. Phillips says that he told Judge Archbald he did not see any possibility of a settlement, because of the very wide difference of opinion as to the value of the property and the merits of the lawsuit.

Notwithstanding that, he again sees Loomis and talks with him on the street and urges him to take the matter up. Nothing, however, is done.

Then Mr. Loomis writes a letter to him and tells him that there is no possibility of a settlement of the matter because of the very great difference of views as to the value of the property.

That is not sufficient for Judge Archbald. Not content with that, he says out of a pure matter of friendship for George M. Watson, he still pursues the matter with more diligence and more eagerness than ever Watson exercised in the case, and writes Loomis a letter urging further consideration of the case. This is the letter which Loomis wrote to Judge Archbald September 27:

SEPTEMBER 27, 1911.

MY DEAR JUDGE: As per our recent interview, I instructed our people to call on Attorney Watson in connection with the Boland case, and I find there is little, if any, prospect of our reaching any settlement of this case, owing to the very great difference of opinion as to the merits of Mr. Boland's claims and the value of his properties.

Thanking you, however, for your good efforts in this direction, I am,

Very truly, yours,

E. E. LOOMIS.

Judge R. W. ARCHBALD, Scranton, Pa.

Then, on September 28, the next day, Judge Archbald replies:

SCRANTON, PA., September 28, 1911.

MY DEAR MR. LOOMIS: I am very sorry to have your letter stating that you have not been able to effect a settlement with Mr. Boland. I trust, however, that the matter is still not beyond remedy. And if I thought that it would help to secure an adjustment, I would offer my direct services. I have no interest except to try and do away with an unpleasant situation for both parties, and I hope that this still may be possible.

Yours, very truly, R. W. ARCHBALD.

Then, on October 3, he, nothing daunted, writes again, urging a personal conference and manifesting a zeal and eagerness that was not born of love for Watson, but of a desire to secure a fee which was dependent on the success of the enterprise:

MY DEAR MR. LOOMIS: I understand that there has been a suggestion that Mr. Watson meet you and possibly also Mr. Truesdale, and that Mr. Watson has written asking for an appointment. It seems to me, if I may be permitted to say so, that this is a very good idea. It will give you an opportunity to discuss the Boland claim with Mr. Watson upon a somewhat different basis than Col. Phillips could, representing the coal department.

I have little doubt but that it will appear so to you, and it may be altogether unnecessary for me to write about it. But I am sure you will not take it amiss to have me do so, and I shall hope that a settlement may yet be reached in that way. There is nothing like a personal interview to bring about such a result.

Yours, very truly, R. W. ARCHBALD.

It has occurred to the minds of some Senators, I have no doubt, that the managers have not proven that Judge Archbald got any money consideration or that he was to get any money consideration for this transaction. It is known now to the Senators who heard this testimony that Judge Archbald knew that the proposition of settlement as presented to Watson by the Bolands was $100,000, and it is known by the testimony of Judge Archbald himself that he and Watson proceeded on the theory that it was to be settled for $161,000. It is known, and it is beyond dispute, that after the time Judge Archbald learned that the basis of settlement was $100,000, and after he learned that Watson was asking the railroad company $161,000, after he knew those two facts, he still wrote two letters to Mr. Loomis urging this settlement and saw Mr. Loomis and Mr. Phillips personally about the matter.

Now, Christy Boland testified that Watson told him that his reason for raising it from $100,000 to $161,000 was because he had to divide this excess and take care of certain persons, among whom was Judge Archbald. I have not a bit of doubt on earth but what Watson told that to Christy Boland. But I do not pretend to say to the Senate here to-day that Judge Archbald and Watson had ever had any agreement or understanding about it, because there is no direct evidence to that effect. But all the circumstances point to that very end, and it is competent evidence for this Senate to consider, because of the fact that Archbald and Watson had entered into the conspiracy to do a wrongful thing, collecting $61,000 more than the Bolands demanded, and it being a statement by one of the coconspirators is competent and proper evidence in this case against Mr. Archbald, and is worthy of consideration.

But I desire to impress this fact upon the Senate now, before I leave this subject, that it does not devolve upon the managers, in the Marian Coal Co. case, to prove that Judge Archbald understood that he was to have a cent of remuneration for his services. It is true that the article charges a consideration, but it does not say a money consideration. If he did this, if he sought for the welfare of this man Watson, if he sought for the benefit of a friend, in order that a friend might make a fee, to use his official power to influence litigants in his court to that end, it is an impeachable offense, and he should be found guilty.

Oh, you say maybe it is not so culpable. No; but the offense exists, and it is a misuse of that power which comes to every man who occupies the position of judge.

Now, I call the attention of the Senate to the third article, about Packer No. 3. That was the case where Judge Archbald and Jones and two or three other gentlemen were to organize a corporation for the purpose of buying Packer No. 3. No money was to be paid by any of these gentlemen. John Henry Jones assured them that he could get the money from a gentleman, Mr. Farrell, in New York. So they put it up to Judge Archbald to see the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., another railroad that was a party defendant in these same suits Nos. 38 and 39. He goes to the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. He goes to Mr. Warriner, of that railroad company, and prevails on him to sell him Packer No. 3 for the benefit of this new corporation. He writes a letter making an appointment to see Mr. Warriner, fulfills the appointment; it is agreed that they shall have Packer No. 3 for a royalty of 2 and 3 cents on the different grades of coal, and afterwards he gets a letter from Mr. Warriner confirming the agreement.

It will be remembered that Madeira, Hill & Co. had been trying to buy Packers Nos. 2, 3, and 4 a year and a half before that. It seems that at that time the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. did not want to sell Packers Nos. 2, 3, and 4, even though Madeira, Hill & Co. offered them a royalty of 5 and 10 cents a ton on the coal.

They say it was not the same packers. It is true that Madeira, Hill & Co. applied for Packers Nos. 2, 3, and 4, and that these gentlemen only applied for Packers Nos. 3 and 4. They got the option for 2 and 3 cents. After culm-dump coal had sprung up immensely in value the railroad company sells to Judge Archbald's corporation for less than one-third of the price that they had refused to take from Madeira, Hill & Co. a year and a half before.

Then comes the Warnke deal. Warnke is the gentleman who gave the note to Judge Archbald for $510. Let us see what Judge Archbald did in consideration for that note. It will be remembered that Warnke had been operating a dump and coal property for some time along the Philadelphia & Reading road, and having his property burned down, he failed to operate it for a while. Then the railroad company declared his lease had been abandoned and that he had not any further right because he was operating under a lease that had been assigned to Warnke, but which the railroad claimed was not assignable. Therefore they refused to allow Warnke to proceed again to operate this dump and this colliery.

Warnke tried a number of people. He went to Baer, the president of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co., and he went to Richards time and time again. Mr. Baer says, in his testimony, that he sent numerous other men to him to get the Reading Railroad Co. to allow him to go on and operate it. Finally, as a last resort, Warnke learned of Judge Archbald's influence with the railroads and he goes to him. I think one of the Joneses told him that Judge Archbald could do that for him. So he sees Judge Archbald, and Judge Archbald writes a letter to Richards, the man who has charge of the coal property of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co., making a date at Pottsville some time in the future. Judge Archbald goes to Pottsville, 80 miles away, to fulfill this appointment with Mr. Richards. When Warnke saw the judge he said, "Now, if you can not get them to renew or revive the lease, which they claim has been abandoned, then see if you can buy the Lincoln culm dump for me." Judge Archbald presented the matter to Richards along that line, and Richards told him "No"; that their answer was final and that they would not allow Mr. Warnke to proceed under his old lease or they would not let to him the Lincoln culm dump.

It is true that Judge Archbald did not succeed in influencing the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. to sell property to his friends at that time, but he tried to. He went just as far as it was necessary for him to go in order to commit the offense charged in this count. He sought to influence them, but failed. It may have been due to the fact that the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. was not in the same position as the Erie, the Lackawanna & Western, and the Lehigh Valley Co.'s were; the Philadelphia & Reading Co. did not have litigation before Judge Archbald just at that time.

Now, there is one other case in which Archbald sought to negotiate two coal transactions.

Before that, however, let me call attention to this with reference to the Warnke case. Judge Archbald returned to Scranton and told Warnke what had happened. Immediately following his effort to get Mr. Richards to comply with Warnke's request, and having failed, he takes up with Mr. Warnke the sale of the Lacoe and Shiffer dump, which was on the Delaware & Hudson Railroad, and from which railroad company a right of way had to be had in order to operate that culm dump successfully.

John Henry Jones testified that when he talked to Warnke about this dump he suggested that they go together to Judge Archbald, because Judge Archbald had had the sale of this dump from Mr. Berry, the secretary of Lacoe & Shiffer Co. So they go to Archbald. Although Archbald's option had expired (Berry says he had granted the option and had extended it from time to time, but that it had expired at that time), notwithstanding that they go to Judge Archbald and have a talk about "Old gravity fill," which was the property of Lacoe & Shiffer. John Henry Jones says that he raised the question as to whether they could get a right of way to operate this dump from the Delaware & Hudson, and that he said there, in the presence of Archbald, to Mr. Warnke that Judge Archbald can take care of that. Anyhow, they bought the old gravity fill. After these events had taken place, after the judge had made a trip of 80 miles to Pottsville to see Richards, and after he had given him advice about the Lacoe-Shiffer transaction, never having put a dollar in it himself, he goes to the office of Mr. Warnke—that is, the Premier Coal Co.—and got this note for $510.

Now there is one other. It is article 6, in which there were two efforts to deal with the railroad companies concerning coal property. You remember hearing a good deal about the Everhart interests. The Everharts owned an interest in 800 acres of coal land. It seems that Mr. Warriner's company, the Lehigh Valley, had some time before that desired to purchase their interest in that property. Dainty tells Judge Archbald about it, and Judge Archbald then goes to see Mr. Warriner. First he has Dainty go to see the Everharts, to see whether or not their interests are purchasable. Then he goes to Warriner and undertakes to get them to agree to buy the Everhart interest in case he and Dainty can get them for sale. While he is there talking with Warriner about that, as Dainty has said to Judge Archbald that he wanted, if possible, to lease from the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. 320 acres of land, another tract of coal land there, he tried to prevail upon Warriner to get the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. to rent that land to Mr. Dainty.

Now, Senators, there are the coal cases. There are seven of them where Judge Archbald sought to get property from and to dispose of property to interstate railroads—to five interstate railroads, three of which had litigation then pending in his court.

Let us summarize, now, briefly as to those counts in the indictment. There is the Katydid, owned by the Erie Railroad Co.; he sought to get that. There is the Marian Coal property, which he tried to sell to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. There are Packers No. 3 and No. 4, which he tried to buy, and which he really did buy from the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.

Next came the Warnke deal, in which he attempted to influence the officers of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. to continue their lease with Warnke or to sell him what was known as the Lincoln dump. Failing in this he undertakes to negotiate another transaction for Warnke by selling to him the dump known as "old gravity fill," owned by Laco & Shiffer, but which required the right of way from the Delaware & Hudson Railroad Co. in order to operate it successfully; and Jones assured Warnke in the presence of Archbald that the judge could take care of that. That makes five instances.

Then Archbald and Dainty conceived the idea of getting the interests of the Everharts in 800 acres of coal land for sale and selling it to the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. At the same time Dainty conceived the idea that he would like to rent from that railroad 320 acres of other coal land. Judge Archbald readily becomes the intermediary in these transactions, makes an appointment with Warnke, who represents that railroad, and seeks to carry these two proposed transactions to a successful end.

Counsel for the respondent called in witnesses here to prove that there was nothing unusual about other people furnishing money to operate these dumps; they offered to prove that because Farrell was to come from New York to put in all the money necessary to operate Packer No. 3 it was not unusual, but that it was a very common and frequent course of business. Aye, but they did not prove any cases where judges of the United States courts had sought to buy property with money furnished by other persons from railroads which had litigation pending at the time in those courts. This is the only instance, thank God! that the records of our country disclose where that thing was done.

These gentlemen seem not to be able to distinguish between the conduct of a man on the Federal bench and a man in private life. Mr. Dainty and Mr. Jones and Mr. Williams, and all those rounders who seem to infest the city of Scranton—any of them had a perfect right to go to those railroad companies and prevail upon them to sell them their coal properties, if they wanted to do so; but they did not have any right to get Judge Archbald to act as intermediary for them in these transactions, because they knew that he was a judge of the Commerce Court and that a judge of the Commerce Court had no right to render his services by reason of his being a judge to these men for that purpose.

There is a strange thing about this case. There are a number of these men; there are the three Joneses—John Henry Jones, Thomas Star Jones, and Fred Jones—and E. J. Williams, and George M. Watson, and Dainty, and Warnke, and Kizer—all of them dealing more or less in coal properties of different kinds—and somehow, every time they came to a proposition where a railroad company was interested in any of these properties, their trail leads always to the office of Judge Archbald in the Federal building.

Another strange thing about all these cases is that in any of these transactions Judge Archbald never did a thing, never put in a dollar, never wrote a letter, never turned a hand, never did anything, except to intercede with the railroad companies. That is what he was employed for. This was the one thing, the only function, which he had to perform.

Why did they go to Judge Archbald? Because they knew, first, that he was a judge of the Commerce Court; second, because they knew that court had jurisdiction over interstate railroad companies; third, they knew that Archbald would use that influence over the interstate railroad companies; and, fourth, they knew that they could get it for a consideration, and thus it was natural they should use him in their business. Judge Archbald, by his conduct, simply worked up a side-line trade in culm dumps from the mere fact that he did have power over the railroad companies.

Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the Rissinger case. It is true that that occurred when Judge Archbald was a district judge, and that he is not now a district judge. Counsel for the respondent have not raised that question in their brief nor in their opening statement, as I recall.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. We raised it in the brief.

Mr. Manager STERLING. I had overlooked it, if it is in the brief; but I remember that one of the Senators raised the question during the trial of the case as to whether or not the House of Representatives could impeach and the Senate convict for an offense committed during a service which the accused was not performing at the time of the articles of impeachment. I think there is but one Federal case—one Federal precedent—on that point. There are State precedents where the language of the State constitution was similar to that of the Federal Constitution; and in those cases it has always been held that the officer could be impeached even though the term of office during which the offense was committed had expired. I think that is the universal rule in all precedents under constitutions similar to the Federal Constitution.

Without, however, taking the time of the Senate to read any of those authorities, I merely desire to call their attention to this proposition: Suppose a man had committed some heinous offense, had been guilty of some degrading or debasing conduct while in the public service, something that had brought the office into disrepute, and before that act had been discovered he had been promoted from that office to some higher office; do you say that under the Constitution, and a Constitution, too, in which there are no limitations as to the time of committing these offenses, the people have no redress and that the Congress of the United States has not the power to impeach? Where is the limitation? Where is the Senate forbidden to convict one for offenses committed prior to the service which he is holding at the time?

The Constitution provides that all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office upon impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors. There is nothing in that clause of the Constitution limiting impeachment and conviction to offenses committed during service in the office from which it is sought to remove him. Who has any power to put any limitation to this clause in the Constitution? It would be indeed a dangerous precedent, if precedents were binding, for the Senate to say that the House had no power to impeach and the Senate no power to convict and remove from office an unworthy servant who had committed crimes in private life or during some prior service, but who had not been discovered until after his appointment to the public service.

Let us see what it would lead to. Suppose this argument in this case was closed, suppose every Senator had reached in his mind the conclusion that the respondent ought to be removed from office; that that is the status of the case to-night when adjournment comes, and that during the nighttime Judge Archbald should send his resignation to the President of the United States and it should be accepted, would you say because he was out of office, because his service had expired by resignation, that you could not impeach and convict him?

Remember that there are two judgments which the Senate can impose in impeachment cases—one the removal from office and the other the disqualification from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. There would be no occasion, if he should resign, for the judgment of the Senate removing him, because the purpose of that judgment would have been accomplished; but would the Senate be deprived of its constitutional power to impose the other judgment and disqualify this man from ever holding office again simply by the act of the accused himself? Will anybody argue that the respondent, the accused, in impeachment cases, has got the power to take away from the Senate its constitutional right to disqualify him for holding public office? I think that is all that need be said on that point; and, with that in view, I desire to discuss briefly the Rissinger case, which occurred when Judge Archbald was a district judge at Scranton.

It will be remembered that Rissinger had some five or six cases pending against insurance companies for the recovery of a fire loss which had occurred in his coal property, and they had been taken from the State court in Luzerne County to the district court over which Judge Archbald presided. It was on the 3d day of October, 1908, when those cases were transferred to the Federal court. In the latter part of September this man Rissinger had seen Judge Archbald and talked to him about the organization of a corporation to take an interest in a Honduras gold-mining scheme. Those negotiations were on when these cases came into the judge's court, but they continued during all the time that those cases were pending, and, according to the original testimony of this man Rissinger, Judge Archbald virtually agreed to become a partner in the enterprise with Rissinger, without the knowledge of those on the other side of the cases. I will, however, agree now, although Rissinger is our witness in the case, that Rissinger is not a reputable witness, because in this case he comes into the Senate here and testifies to an entirely different state of facts from what he did then; but it is immaterial which horn of the dilemma these gentlemen take in the case, because, in any event, Judge Archbald is culpable and committed an offense for which he ought to be removed from office.

This man Rissinger brings Mr. Russell from New York to lay the matter before Judge Archbald, and he tells him about the wonderful things in that Honduras gold-mining scheme. Then it goes on, and these cases come for trial early in November, I think. During the trial of the first case, after the evidence for the plaintiff—that is, Mr. Rissinger—was submitted and they had closed their case, the defendant demurred to the evidence, and Judge Archbald overruled the demurrer, holding with Rissinger in the case. It may have been proper; I do not know, I do not care, and it is not for the Senate to try the case of Rissinger against the insurance companies, but whether it was a right decision or a wrong decision, all we care for is to know that it occurred while these negotiations were pending between Rissinger and Archbald with reference to this gold-mining scheme.

Then a little later—I think on the 28th day of November, the very day that the judgments in those cases matured—you remember, after the judge held the evidence sufficient to sustain a case, they settled the case for something like $25,000, to be paid in 15 days—the very day those judgments matured Mr. Rissinger makes a note to Judge Archbald for the sum of $2,500. Archbald indorses the note, turns it back to Rissinger, and Rissinger takes it to the bank and gets the money on it. Now, that is not the material part in the proposition at all.

Rissinger said before the Judiciary Committee that the agreement at that time was that Judge Archbald was to pay one-third of the note and take the value of that third in stock of the Honduras gold-mining scheme. In any event, in a very short time after that and before the note had matured—it was a four months' note—84 shares of stock of the Scranton-Honduras Mining Co., which was to take a part of the property of this gold-mining scheme in Honduras, were delivered to Judge Archbald. Judge Archbald said it was collateral security for the note, but this stock on its face was only worth $1,680 at $20 a share. It was not delivered to Judge Archbald at the time he indorsed the note and turned it over to this man Rissinger. That would have been the time when one would generally take collateral security, and when one takes collateral security they generally take a little more than the amount of their liability instead of very much less; and when one indorses stock as collateral security for liability on a note the man who gets the benefit of it generally assigns his stock over to the party that indorses it, but this stock was issued direct from the corporation to Judge Archbald and delivered to him some two months after he had indorsed this note.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to another fact. I shall not read it, but I trust that one of the other managers in this case will read the statute of the United States on bribery. It provides that any judge who takes anything of value with a view of influencing his decision, or after a decision receives anything of value on account of it, is guilty of bribery, even though it did not influence his judgment. Even though it did not influence his decision, it is bribery.

Is there a more charitable construction that can be put upon the conduct of Judge Archbald in receiving this present? Rissinger now says the judge never paid a cent for this stock and he never expected him to pay a cent for it. It was simply a present to Judge Archbald of this stock in this gold-mining scheme after the decision of the judge in favor of Rissinger. Is there a more charitable construction, I ask you, than the one I have suggested in this instance? If there is, I agree that it is the duty of Senators to adopt it. If we can eliminate from our minds the fact and the thought that Rissinger was a litigant in Judge Archbald's court, if we can eliminate from our minds the thought and the knowledge that Judge Archbald presided over the court in which Rissinger was a litigant, then we may put another construction on this transaction. Rissinger was there in Scranton to sell stock in this gold-mining scheme, and he, like many another faker who has undertaken to defraud the public in transactions of this kind, went to men of influence in that community. It seems the person first of all to whom he appeals is Judge Archbald. He enlists him in the enterprise. He gets his name connected with the enterprise in order to do what? To sell stock to other people in Scranton. Judge Archbald had no personal knowledge of this scheme in Honduras; he had no knowledge at all, except what he had gotten from an entire stranger, George Russell, who came to see him from New York. Is this man, who had sat, as he has said, for 20 years upon the bench listening to cases of this kind, listening to contentious lawyers during all of this time—is this man so guileless that it never occurred to him that Rissinger wanted his name to influence other men to go into this scheme?

Aye, Senators, a judge who will sell his name for a consideration to any kind of an enterprise, good or bad—and the chances are a hundred to one that this one was bad—a judge who will sell his name to any kind of an enterprise to influence other people less experienced than he perhaps—and I know there are people in Scranton who, if they saw Judge Archbald's name connected with this gold-mining scheme, would say, "That must be good," because it has been proven here to the Senate that his reputation in Scranton was A number 1, and I know the use of his name would have its influence in misleading people to invest their money and their property in that get-rich-quick scheme—a judge who will do that, a man who will do that, is not fit to sit on the Federal bench.

I next call attention, Mr. President, very briefly to the Helm Bruce case. I think that Senators who listened to the testimony of Judge Archbald are of the opinion that the correspondence which Judge Archbald had with Helm Bruce about that case reversed the first decision of the court and compelled a different decision from the one the court had first agreed upon. Is it sufficient to say that the final decision was right? I do not know whether it was or not, and I do not care; neither do Senators care whether the last decision was right or whether the first decision was right. At any rate, it developed that when all the judges of the Commerce Court, except Judge Archbald, were in favor of deciding the case in favor of the Board of Commerce of New Orleans and against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., Judge Archbald held out for the railroad company, and then began this correspondence with Helm Bruce about the evidence of one Compton. He did not tell the other members of the court what he had done; never telling the counsel on the other side what he had done or never giving them notice. Then, after this man Bruce had sent this correction in—and it may have been a perfectly proper correction; I do not know; he might have been right about it—the judge writes to him again, and Bruce submits another argument, a long argument, on some phases in the case. That was as late as January. After that the court filed an opinion exactly opposite from that on which they originally agreed, and that final opinion was filed in the month of February. I believe that the inevitable and logical and reasonable conclusion is that Judge Archbald, by reason of this assistance from Helm Bruce, was able to convince the court that their first decision was wrong, and compelled them to reverse it.

But suppose it is a righteous decision, what does the other fellow think about it when he was deprived of the right to come before that court and present his side of the contention about which Helm Bruce wrote to Judge Archbald? That is the question, Senators; and I say that it seems to me that we are impelled to the conviction that Judge Archbald was determined—and I am inclined to think that he was wrongfully determined—to have that case decided in favor of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. The reason I think he wrongfully sought to do it was because he kept all his transactions with Helm Bruce in utter secrets, both from his colleagues on the bench and from the attorneys on the other side of the case. If he had disclosed the transaction to them, if he had sent a copy of the letter that he wrote to Helm Bruce to the lawyers on the other side of the case, how easy it would have been to have given them an opportunity to reply. Is it possible that a man on the bench for 20 years does not better understand the ethics of the bench than that? The first thing those of us who are lawyers learned in the practice of our profession was that it was always unethical to do anything in a case without giving the lawyer on the other side due notice; yet Judge Archbald, standing here as he does, pretends to tell the Senate that it was innocently done and that it never occurred to him that it was bad ethics.

Now, just a word about the appointment of this man Woodward as jury commissioner. I do not maintain that the offense consists of appointing a railroad lawyer jury commissioner. I mean by that that the mere fact that he was a railroad lawyer does not in itself constitute the offense. If Judge Archbald had appointed any man who had one general line of litigation and one class of clients and always appeared in court for that class of clients on the same particular side of that litigation, the appointment of any lawyer who occupied that position at the bar would be the same kind of an offense, whether he represented railroads or whether he represented some other class of citizens. Suppose the farmers in a community had in some court a long line of litigation of the same kind and character and that they joined together and employed one lawyer to try the cases and to represent them in court, and suppose the judge should appoint that lawyer jury commissioner to select the jury that was to try those cases. It is the possibilities of wrong that renders such a thing offensive to a fair-minded man.

The offense does not consist in the fact that Woodward represented railroads, but that he was a lawyer who represented one particular class of clients and appeared in court on one side of litigation. If Woodward had to-day represented the railroad company and to-morrow had represented the railroad employees, the next day had represented the injured passenger, the next day the shipper, and the next day the farmer who had had his stock killed by reason of a bad fence along the right of way, it would not be so bad, for then Woodward could not have packed a jury on his side of all those cases, because when he was packing it for himself on one case he would be packing it against himself on the case he would try to-morrow. There is the offense and the indiscretion.

Aye, gentlemen, do you ask the question, Would you remove Judge Archbald for appointing Woodward jury commissioner when it is not proven here that Woodward ever exercised his power wrongfully? Do you say now, honor bright, would you remove him from office for that? No; I would not if it stood alone, but it is a part of the system; it goes to make up the system; it is an incident in the line of misconduct which has been carried on by Judge Archbald. Do you ask the question, Would you impeach and convict Judge Archbald and remove him from office for his correspondence with Helm Bruce? I speak for myself when I say no, I would not, if that stood alone; but it is a part of the system; it is one fact which dovetails into this line of conduct which he has carried on with the railroads, and it is a system so rank that "it smells to heaven."

Mr. President, I have said all I care to say on the facts in this case. The evil that arises from that course of conduct that has been pursued by Judge Archbald is the effect that it has upon the public mind. That is the most serious evil. It has the tendency to create in the minds of the people a sentiment that their Government is not being honestly administered. These times are pregnant now with that sentiment, and the great and serious responsibility devolves upon those entrusted with the power to purify the public service, to seek out the evildoers and give the public their just relief from maladministration in public office. It is not within the power or the right of Congress to pardon or excuse. The people never delegated that power to us, and for us to seek to excuse the evildoer would be an usurpation. It is our plain duty to purge the public service of such a man. The people should not be bound to submit to his dominion. His course of conduct is such that under the Constitution his tenure of office is ended. That instrument says he shall hold his office during good behavior. In determining what is misbehavior in office we do not ask you to measure Judge Archbald by the standard of your highest ideals. Measure him by the average judge, State or national, and your estimate of him will be that he is unworthy and should be removed from office.

The evil that comes from Judge Archbald's conduct is the fact that it shakes the faith of the people in that branch of government which is the very foundation source of justice. Among all the great responsibilities of Congress the one that stands above them all is their duty to purify and keep undefiled the judiciary. Within the breast of every just and upright judge repose the seeds that grow and blossom and ripen into better, freer institutions.

The people have nowhere to go, under that instrument which they denominate their Constitution, but to the House for articles of impeachment. I believe the House has done its whole duty in this case, and likewise the people under that great instrument have nowhere to go for the trial and conviction of unworthy servants except the Senate, and we confidently hope the Senate will do its full duty in the premises in this case. May the people always turn to that great instrument as their refuge and their harbor.

And so for this, Mr. President, we, as managers on the part of the House, ask you to remove this man from the office with which you honored him because he has dishonored it. We ask you to strip him of the ermine with which you clothed him because he has sullied it.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, I believe it is now six minutes after 3 o'clock, and Mr. Manager WEBB will next address the Senate.

ARGUMENT OF MR. WEBB, ONE OF THE MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. Manager WEBB. Mr. President, the respondent's counsel, in his brief filed during the holidays, devotes 26 pages to a discussion of this proposition, "Impeachment lies only for offenses which are properly the subject of a prosecution by indictment or information in a criminal court."

I think it will not be amiss, Mr. President, to discuss that proposition on behalf of the managers for a little while. It is true that in those 26 pages of argument most of the quotations are from counsel who have appeared for respondents in various impeachment trials. I do not remember just at present a single noted constitutional authority that counsel quotes to maintain that proposition.

I wish to quote an early authority in opposition to this position. Wooddesson, in 1777, said:

"It is certain that magistrates and officers intrusted with the administration of public affairs may abuse their delegated powers to the extensive detriment of the community and at the same time in a manner not properly cognizable before the ordinary tribunals. On this policy is founded the origin of impeachments, which began soon after the Constitution assumed its present form" (p. 355).

Rawle, in his work on the Constitution—and everyone will acknowledge him universal authority on the Constitution—says:

"The fondness frequently felt for the inordinate extension of power, the influence of party and of prejudice, the seductions of foreign States, or the baser appetite for illegitimate emoluments, are sometimes productions of what are not unaptly termed 'political offenses' (Federalist, No. 65), which it would be difficult to take cognizance of in the ordinary course of judicial proceeding.

"The involutions and varieties of vice are too many and too artful to be anticipated by positive law."

Judge Story says on this subject:

"In examining the parliamentary history of impeachments it will be found that many offenses not easily definable by law and many of a purely political character have been deemed high crimes and misdemeanors worthy of this extraordinary remedy."

Tucker, in his work on the Constitution, says—

"These two cases"—

Discussing the two in which impeachments and convictions occurred—

"These two cases, therefore, show that the words 'high crimes and misdemeanors' can not be confined to crimes created and defined by a statute of the United States."

In a footnote to Fourth Blackstone (p. 5, Lewis's ed.), Christian says:

"The word 'crime' has no technical meaning in the law of England. It seems, when it has a reference to positive law, to comprehend those acts which subject the offender to punishment. When the words 'high crimes and misdemeanors' are used in prosecutions by impeachment the words 'high crimes' have no definite signification, but are used merely to give greater solemnity to the charge."

In Cooley's Principles of Constitutional Law it is said (p. 178):

"The offenses for which the President or any other officer may be impeached are any such as are in the opinion of the House deserving of punishment under that process. They are not necessarily offenses against the general laws."

In his work on the Constitutional History of the United States, George Ticknor Curtis says (vol. 1, pp. 481–482):

"But a cause for removal from office may exist where no offense against positive law has been committed, as where the individual has, from immorality or imbecility or maladministration, become unfit to exercise the office. The rules by which an impeachment is to be determined are, therefore, peculiar and are not fully embraced by those principles or provisions of law which courts of ordinary jurisdiction are required to administer."

In Watson on the Constitution (vol. 2, p. 1034) it is said:

"Congress has unhesitatingly adopted the conclusion that no previous statute is necessary to authorize an impeachment for any official misconduct. In the few cases of impeachment which have hitherto been tried no one of the charges has rested upon any statutable misdemeanors. An examination of the English precedents will show that, although private citizens as well as public officers have been impeached, no article has been presented or sustained which did not charge either misconduct in office or some offense which was injurious to the welfare of the State at large."

The American and English Encyclopedia of Law, which is an acknowledged authority, says:

"In each of the only two cases of impeachment tried by the Senate in which a conviction resulted the defendant was found guilty of offenses not indictable either at common law or under any Federal statute, and in almost every case brought offenses were charged in the articles of impeachment which were not indictable under any Federal statute, and in several cases they were such as constituted neither a statutory nor a common-law crime. The impeachability of the offense charged in the articles was, in most of the cases, not denied."

Mr. Bayard, in Blount's trial, said:

"Impeachment is a proceeding of a purely political nature. It is not so much designed to punish the offender as to secure the State. It touches neither his person nor his property, but simply divests him of his political capacity." (Wharton's State Trials, 263.)

Story on the Constitution (p. 583), as has been quoted before, says:

"In the few cases of impeachment which have hitherto been tried, no one of the charges has rested upon any statutable misdemeanors.

"The reasoning by which the power of the House of Representatives to punish for contempts (which are breaches of privileges and offenses not defined by any positive laws) has been upheld by the Supreme Court stands upon similar grounds; for if the House had no jurisdiction to punish for contempts until the acts had been previously defined and ascertained by positive law it is clear that the process of arrest would be illegal.

"In examining the parliamentary history of impeachments, it will be found that many offenses, not easily definable by law and many of a purely political character, have been deemed high crimes and misdemeanors worthy of this extraordinary remedy."

One can not but be struck in this slight enumeration with the utter unfitness of the common tribunals of justice to take cognizance of such offenses, and with the entire propriety of confiding the jurisdiction over them to a tribunal capable of understanding and reforming and scrutinizing the policy of the state and of sufficient dignity to maintain the independence and reputation of worthy public officers, citing again the American and English Encyclopedia of Law (vol. 15, p. 1066).

The cases, then, seem to establish that impeachment is not a mere mode of procedure for the punishment of indictable crimes; that the phrase of "high crimes and misdemeanors" is to be taken, not in its common-law but in its broader parliamentary sense; and is to be interpreted in the light of parliamentary usage, that in this sense it includes not only crimes for which an indictment may be brought but grave political offenses, corruptions, maladministration, or neglect of duty involving moral turpitude, arbitrary and oppressive conduct, and even gross improprieties by judges and high officers of state; although such offenses be not of a character to render the offender liable to an indictment either at common law or under any statute.

Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies (p. 980, par. 2539) says:

"The purpose of impeachment in modern times is the prosecution and punishment of high crimes and misdemeanors, chiefly of an official or political character, which are either beyond the reach of the law or which no other authority in the State but the supreme legislative power is competent to prosecute."

In the Peck case (p. 308) Mr. Manager Wickliffe said:

"The term 'misdemeanor' covers every act of misbehavior in a popular sense. Misdemeanor in office and misbehavior in office mean the same thing. (7 Dane Abgt., 365.) Misbehavior, therefore, which is a mere negative of good behavior, is the express limitation of an office of a judge."

Mr. Manager Palmer said in the Swayne impeachment trial:

"We may, therefore, conclude that the House has the right to impeach and the Senate the power to try a judicial officer for any misbehavior or misconduct which evidences his unfitness for the bench without reference to its indictable quality. All history, all precedent, and all text-writers agree upon this proposition. The direful consequences attendant upon any other theory are manifest.

"The word 'misdemeanor' used in the parliamentary sense as applied to offenses means maladministration, misconduct not necessarily indictable, not only in England but in the United States.

"Removal of a judge for misbehavior or lack of good behavior is impossible unless it can be done through the impeaching power. Otherwise the people are powerless to rid themselves of the most unworthy, disgraceful, and unfit official."

Judge Curtis, in his History of the Constitution (pp. 260, 261), says:

"The purposes of an impeachment lie wholly beyond the penalties of the statute or the customary law. The object of the proceeding is to ascertain whether cause exists for removing a public officer from office. Such a cause may be found in the fact that either in the discharge of his office or aside from the functions he has violated a law or committed what is technically denominated a crime; but a cause for removal from office may exist where no offense against positive law is committed, as where the individual has from immorality, imbecility, or maladministration become unfit to exercise the office."

In the Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, by Roger Foster, volume 1, page 560, this statement is made:

"The object of the grant of power was to free the Commonwealth from the danger caused by the retention of an unworthy public servant."

Again, on page 586, this statement:

"The Constitution provides that 'the judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their office during good behavior.'

"This necessarily implies that they may be removed in case of bad behavior. But no means except impeachment is provided for their removal, and judicial misconduct is not indictable by either a statute of the United States or the common law."

In Story on the Constitution (5th ed.), section 796, it is said:

"Is the silence of the statute book to be deemed conclusive in favor of the party until Congress has made a legislative declaration and enumeration of the offenses which shall be deemed high crimes and misdemeanors? If so, then, as has been truly remarked (citing Rawle on the Constitution), the power of impeachment, except as to the two expressed cases, is a complete nullity and the party is wholly dispunishable, however enormous may be his corruption or criminality."

Rawle, again, on the Constitution, page 211, says:

"The involutions and varieties of vice are too many and too artful to be anticipated by positive law."

In Story on the Constitution, volume 1 (5th ed.), page 584:

"800. In examining the parliamentary history of impeachments it will be found that many offenses not easily definable by law and many of a purely political character have been deemed high crimes and misdemeanors worthy of this extraordinary remedy."

John Randolph Tucker, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, volume 1, section 200, says:

"To confine the impeachable offenses to those which are made crimes or misdemeanors by statute or other specific law would too much constrict the jurisdiction to meet the obvious purpose of the Constitution, which was by impeachment to deprive of office those who by any act of omission or commission showed clear and flagrant disqualification to hold it."

Mr. Cooley, in his Principles of Constitutional Law (p. 178), discussing impeachment against the President and Vice President, says:

"The offenses for which the President or any other officer may be impeached are any such as, in the opinion of the House, are deserving of punishment under that process. They are not necessarily offenses against the general law."

Curtis, in his Constitutional History of the United States, volume 1, pages 481 and 482, says:

"The purposes of an impeachment lie wholly beyond the penalties of the statute or the customary law. The object of the proceeding is to ascertain whether cause exists for removing a public officer from office."

In Watson on the Constitution, volume 2, page 1034, published in 1910, it is said:

"A misdemeanor comprehends all indictable offenses which do not amount to a felony, as perjury, battery, libels, conspiracies, attempts and solicitations to commit felonies, etc. These seem to be the terms of these definitions at common law, but it would be strange if a civil officer could be impeached for only such offenses as are embraced within the common-law definition of 'other high crimes and misdemeanors.' Synonymous with the term 'misdemeanor' are the terms 'misdeed, misconduct, misbehavior, fault, transgression.'"

In American and English Encyclopedia of Law (vol. 15, pp. 1036–1068) it is said:

"If impeachment in England be regarded merely as a mode of trial for the punishment of common-law or statutory crimes, and if the Constitution has adopted it only as a mode of procedure, leaving the crimes to which it is to be applied to be settled by the general rules of criminal law; then, as it is well settled that in regard to the National Government there are no common-law crimes, it would seem necessary to follow that impeachment can be instituted only for crimes specifically named in the Constitution or for offenses declared to be crimes by Federal statute. This view has been maintained by very eminent authority, but the cases of impeachment that have been brought under the Constitution would seem to give to the remedy a much wider scope than the above rule would indicate. In each of the only two cases of impeachment tried by the Senate in which a conviction resulted the defendant was found guilty of offenses not indictable either at common law or under any Federal statute, and in almost every case brought offenses were charged in the articles of impeachment which were not indictable under any Federal statute, and in several cases they were such as constituted neither a statutory nor a common-law crime.

"The cases, then, seem to establish that impeachment is not a mere mode of procedure for the punishment of indictable crimes; that the phrase 'high crimes and misdemeanors' is to be taken not in its common-law but in its broader parliamentary sense, and is to be interpreted in the light of parliamentary usage; that in this sense it includes not only crimes for which an indictment may be brought, but grave political offenses, corruption, maladministration, or neglect of duty involving moral turpitude, arbitrary and oppressive conduct, and even gross improprieties by judges and high officers of State, although such offenses be not of such a character to render the offender liable to an indictment either at common law or under any statute."

Now, Mr. President, that much I have said on the question of the necessity of showing an indictable offense before the Senate can impeach. There is another clause in the Constitution which we hope, if it has not already been vitalized, to revitalize and bring to the attention of the Senate and ask you to give it some power and force and tell us by your verdict what it means.

If the Constitution, Article III, section 1, means anything, then we want to bring it before the Senate to-day and ask Senators to say what it does mean when it provides that judges of the Supreme Court and inferior courts shall hold their offices "during good behavior."

The provision in Article II of the Constitution, section 4, Mr. President, refers to impeachment of the President, Vice President, and other civil officers for treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors; but later on in that same great instrument, after Article II had been adopted, the constitutional fathers say the judges of the United States shall hold their offices "during good behavior."

It has been pointed out by many constitutional writers, and you yourselves see, that the people have no way of getting rid of a judge who has violated this provision by misbehavior except it is done by this great body. What does "during good behavior" mean?

The Century Dictionary says:

"During good behavior: As long as one remains blameless in the discharge of one's duties or the conduct of one's life; as an office held during good behavior."

Mr. Foster, in his work on the Constitution, page 586, makes this statement:

"The Constitution provides that 'the judges both of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior.'"

This necessarily implies that they can be removed in case of bad behavior. But no means except impeachment is provided for their removal, and judicial misconduct is not indictable by either a statute of the United States or the common law.

Says Elliott in his debates on the Constitution:

"Mr. Dickinson moved as an amendment to Article II, section 2, after the words 'good behavior,' the words, 'Provided, That they may be removed by the Executive on the application of the Senate and the House of Representatives.'"

This was in respect of the judges.

Mr. Gerry seconded the motion. Mr. Gouverneur Morris thought it a contradiction in terms to say that the judges should hold their offices during good behavior and yet be removable without a trial. Besides, it was fundamentally wrong to subject judges to so arbitrary an authority.

But, mark you, the object then was to remove for bad behavior, but to give them a trial, as the Senate is doing in this particular case.

Judge Lawrence, in the Johnson impeachment case, page 643, says:

"Impeachment was deemed sufficiently comprehensive to cover every proper cause for removal."

In Watson on the Constitution, the proposition is stated as follows (vol. 2, pp. 1036–1037):

"What will those who advocate the doctrine that impeachment will not lie except for an offense punishable by statute do with the constitutional provision relative to judges, which says, 'Judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior'? This means that as long as they behave themselves their tenure of office is fixed and they can not be disturbed. But suppose they cease to behave themselves? When the Constitution says, 'A judge shall hold his office during good behavior,' it means that he shall not hold it when it ceases to be good."

I suppose the argument in the Federalist, Mr. President, had as much to do with the adoption of the Constitution of the United States as any other authority. I quote:

"The principle of this objection would condemn a practice which is to be seen in all the State governments, if not in all the governments with which we are acquainted; I mean that of rendering those who hold offices during pleasure dependent on the pleasure of those who appoint them." (Federalist, p. 306.)

And that is yourselves, Senators, for the President nominates judges and you appoint them.

According to the plan of the convention, all the judges who may be appointed by the United States are to hold their offices during good behavior, which is conformable to the most approved State constitutions. (Federalist, p. 355.)

Upon the whole, there can be no room to doubt that the convention acted wisely in copying from the models of those constitutions which have established good behavior as the tenure of judicial offices, in point of duration, and that so far from being blamable on this account their plan would have been inexcusably defective if it had wanted this most important feature of good government. (Federalist, p. 361; Publius.)

Mr. President, after counsel for the respondent has discussed in 26 pages of his brief the proposition that the respondent is not impeachable unless he is indictable, he then makes this concession—that if it is not necessary to prove indictable offenses against the judge, it is necessary, at least, to prove some offense of a criminal nature.

Mr. President, after all crime is nothing but misconduct. The only thing that is made criminal in this country is some form of misconduct.

Before proceeding to argue the facts in the case, I maintain that any judge of a high court who will dicker and traffic with litigants in his court while their cases are pending ought to be indictable, because such conduct is criminal in its nature, and the reason it has not been made indictable long ago is because the people of the United States have never thought it necessary to surround the judiciary with such a statute.

The charges here, therefore, are criminal in their nature, in all good conscience, and I do not know but that the result of this impeachment trial may bring forth a statute making indictable such offenses as are admitted by this judge in this case. Many a man has served upon the chain gang or has been consigned to the county jail for offenses much less criminal in their nature than those which this judge here has admitted that he has been guilty of. It ought to be indictable for a judge of a high court who is embarrassed financially to send his worthless note to a litigant in his court and ask that it be discounted. All of the charges that are admitted here and proven, too, are, Mr. President, in good conscience and in good morals criminal in their nature.

I believe counsel for respondent also takes the position in his brief that this judge is not impeachable now as a circuit court judge for acts which he committed as a district court judge. Mr. President, just a few words on that point. There is no merit in the argument that this respondent can not be impeached at present for acts committed by him while he was district judge. It is true that he is now a circuit judge, but it is also true that immediately before he became a circuit judge he was a district judge. He never ceased to be a judge or civil officer of the United States.

During the last 12 years he has only been elevated one rung in the judicial ladder. His office as judge under the United States has been continuous since his appointment as district judge 11 years ago. This question was raised in the impeachment trial of Judge D. M. Furches in North Carolina in 1901. There the respondent was impeached while he was chief justice of North Carolina for acts committed while he was an associate justice, two distinct and separate offices, but his defense did not avail. Both the authorities and reason compelled the repudiation of such a defense, and, to use the language of Judge William R. Allen, now of the supreme court of our State, then one of the managers in the Furches impeachment trial:

"The purpose of impeachment is to remove an officer whose conduct is a menace to the public interest, and it would be strange, indeed, if he could escape punishment by being elevated to a higher official position. If such a defense could be sustained, one could by resignation avoid an investigation into his conduct by a court of impeachment, and if he was of the same political faith as the head of the executive department, and in sympathy with it, he could be transferred from one office to another, and thus avoid impeachment altogether. The effect of such defense would be to practically destroy the power of impeachment, and, at any rate, it would be greatly impaired. We believe that the authorities are practically unanimous in sustaining our contention that the change of office does not affect the power of impeachment. He is now exercising the same powers that he exercised when he was an associate justice. He is performing the same duties. He is practically filling the same office."

Mr. Foster, on this subject, says:

"The power of impeachment is granted for the public protection, in order to not only remove, but perpetually disqualify for office a person who has shown himself dangerous to the Commonwealth by his official acts. The object of this salutary constitutional provision would be defeated could a person by resignation from office obtain immunity from impeachment. State senates have sustained articles of impeachment for offenses committed at previous and immediately preceding terms of the same or a similar office."

Is it not true that Judge Archbald now holds a similar office to that which he held in 1908? He is now a circuit judge, and the powers and duties of district and circuit judges are almost identical. In the case of State against Hill, to be found in the Thirty-seventh Nebraska Reports, we find this language:

"Judge Barnard was impeached in the State of New York during his second term for acts committed in his previous term of office. His plea that he was not liable to impeachment for offenses occurring in the first term was overruled.

"Precisely the same question was raised in the impeachment proceeding against Judge Hubbell, of Wisconsin, and on the trial of Gov. Butler, of this State, in each of which the ruling was the same as in the Barnard case. There was good reason for overruling the plea to the jurisdiction in the three cases just mentioned. Each respondent was a civil officer at the time he was impeached, and had been such uninterruptedly since the alleged misdemeanors in office were committed. The fact that the offenses occurred in the previous term was immaterial."

I am still quoting from the Supreme Court of Nebraska:

"The object of impeachment is to remove a corrupt or unworthy officer. If his term has expired and he is no longer in office, that object is attained and the reason for his impeachment no longer exists. But if the offender is still an officer he is amenable to impeachment, although the acts charged were committed in the previous term of the same office. The ruling of the Senate of the United States upon the impeachment of William W. Belknap also furnishes a precedent for our contention. Prior to the adoption of the articles of impeachment against Belknap he tendered his resignation to the President, and it was accepted, and upon his trial he interposed a plea to the jurisdiction on the ground that he had ceased to be an officer and was not liable to impeachment, and this plea was overruled by the Senate."

We have, then, five precedents, one by the Senate of the United States, one by the Senate of New York, one by the Senate of North Carolina, one by the State of Wisconsin, and another by the court of impeachment of Nebraska, indorsed by the Supreme Court of Nebraska and by Foster in his work on the Constitution.

We therefore confidently maintain that the respondent in this trial is now impeachable for acts which he committed while district judge of the middle district of Pennsylvania.

I shall not go into the discussion of the origin of impeachment trials, but will just quote this excerpt from one constitutional writer. Mr. Foster, in his splendid work on the Constitution, says:

"Impeachment trials are a survival of the earliest kinds of jurisprudence, when all cases were tried before an assembly of the citizens of the tribe or State. Later, ordinary cases, both civil and criminal, were assigned to courts created for that purpose, but matters of great public importance were still reserved for a decision of the whole body of citizens, or subsequently, of the council of elders, heads of families, or holders of fiefs."

This arrangement could be preserved in earlier times when population was sparse and business intercourse small and human affairs were not intricate; but as civilization became more complex and the division of labor in administering judicial affairs became more urgent, the right to decide and pass upon various questions was allotted to different officers, and so, to-day, we have a judicial system in which all judicial power is lodged, but distributed to different courts, but in all this evolution and distribution of judicial power there is one great right which the people have always reserved unto themselves, and that is the right to supervise the conduct of public officials, and, through their representatives, to remove such officials from office for misconduct or misbehavior, and so, Senators, you sit to-day, theoretically at least, as the court of 90,000,000 people, who have commanded us through the popular branch of Congress to bring this respondent before you to inquire into his conduct and ascertain if the condition on which he was appointed to the high office which he now holds has not been broken by him.

Quoting Foster again:

"What, it may be asked, is the true spirit of the institution itself? Is it not designed as a method of national inquest into the conduct of public men?"

This right to inquire into the conduct of public officials has been reserved to the people themselves, and this great Senate is the tribunal in which such questions must be tried, and necessarily and properly the powers of this court are "broad, strong, and elastic, so that all misconduct may be investigated and the public service purified." The fathers of the Constitution realized the importance of reserving unto the people the right to remove an unworthy or unsatisfactory official, and they were indeed wise in not attempting to define or limit the powers of the Court of Impeachment, but left that power so plenary that no misconduct on the part of a public official might escape its just punishment.

It is not by inadvertence that the Constitution is not more specific in regard to the powers and duties of the Court of Impeachment.

Judge Cooley, in an article written for the Encyclopedia Britannica, speaking of the provisions of the Constitution, says:

"But the constitutional provision was necessarily left vague and very much at large in view of the absolute impossibility of specifying by enumeration or description in advance the infinite variety of ways in which public officers may so conduct themselves as to render their further continuance in office a public scandal or a public danger."

Now, Senators, let us for a little while, as briefly as the occasion will permit, examine the evidence in this case and arrive at the conclusion as to whether or not the respondent has been guilty of any conduct which justifies his removal from office.

Mr. President, in the consideration of the evidence and the law in this case, we shall ask the calm and deliberate consideration of each Member of the Senate, and shall expect that he shall pronounce such verdict as his mind and conscience dictate.

In this proceeding we should simply apply common sense to common facts in an uncommon case. It is an uncommon case, because never in the history of this great trial body have so many misdemeanors, so much misconduct, and so many gross improprieties and ugly facts been proven on a United States judge. I believe that never before in the history of trial bodies has a defendant admitted so many damaging facts, and yet asked his triers to draw from these facts a conclusion of innocence. This respondent's conduct, Mr. President, both upon the proof and upon his admissions, has been wrong and reprehensible, gross and inexcusable.

Mr. President and Senators, under the first article of impeachment it is charged that Judge Archbald used his influence as a United States Commerce Court judge to secure from the Erie Railroad Co. the culm bank known as the Katydid culm bank. I shall not discuss the details of it. It would be wearisome probably to you, because you have just heard it discussed in a most excellent manner by Mr. STERLING. But I do wish to point out some few points in the testimony which may have escaped you.

In the first place, Mr. President, there is a general charge that this judge has been guilty of culm-dump mongering from the time he became a Commerce Court judge until the time he was overtaken. I have a list of letters here that the judge has written about culm dumps beginning the 31st of March, 1911, and winding up when it was whispered around Scranton that this matter was being investigated. It covers two pages and a half, beginning March 31 to Mr. May and on down to March 12, 1912, to Mr. Bruce. There are some 50 or 60 of these letters, I believe. Nobody knows how many personal conversations there were; nobody knows how many phone calls there were. I really do not see how this high court judge could have done much judicial work on the bench and attended to all these numerous culm-dump transactions with the various litigants in his court which are in evidence here. He seems to have started out with the idea that he was probably not worldly wise, as some of the witnesses said, and I guess he was not; and he began to trade and traffic in what? In money? No. Did he have any experience in the coal business? No. He never owned a washery. I do not know that he ever saw a culm dump. He never mined coal. He had no financial standing. What was he trafficking in from the beginning of his career, just after he was put on the Commerce Court bench, when the railroads came under his jurisdiction, until the present time? He had nothing to traffic in except his influence as a judge.

Senators, you can read this testimony from one end of it to the other and that is the only conclusion that you are driven to, because I say again he had no experience in coal dumps; he had no knowledge of coal property; he had no financial standing. All that was left him to make gain for himself was traffic in that sacred influence derived from the office of judge. Paul, in writing to his beloved Timothy, from many years of ripe experience, said:

"And having food and raiment, let us be therewith content.

"But they that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition.

"For the love of money is the root of all evil."

The judge seems to have adopted as soon as he went on the Commerce Court bench and on the district court bench old Ben Jonson's advice, where he says:

"Get money; still get money, boy,
No matter by what means."

Or, as Pope says in his imitation of Horace:

"Get place and wealth, if possible, with grace;
If not, by any means get wealth and place."

The judge has sorely violated the proprieties of his office in order to make these advantageous contracts. The beginning of his advantageous contracting, so far as his position as Commerce Court judge, was with the Erie Railroad Co., which had a suit pending in his court from April, 1911, until the present time. I believe it has been decided by the Supreme Court in the last few months.

That case was argued in the Commerce Court, I believe, some time in May, 1911—between April and May. It was appealed to the Supreme Court on the preliminary injunction which Judge Archbald's court had granted. Therefore, this Erie Railroad case, known as the Lighterage case, was still pending in the judge's court at the time he secured for himself and Williams the option on the Katydid dump.

Now, Mr. President, I do not know what manner of man old man Williams is, but I can not have a good opinion of a Federal judge who is the almost constant companion of such men as E. J. Williams, Fred Warnke, John Henry Jones, Rissinger, Dainty, the man who was off fishing and automobiling when the House of Representatives was seeking his testimony here. I say his business companions and associates show his ideas of propriety are very, very low, and we may expect to find in such a man almost a seared judicial conscience when it comes to propriety.

Old man Williams knew the power of Judge Archbald. "Now, Judge, if you will give me a letter to May I can get this culm dump." But the judge was not going to let Williams get that culm dump on his own account. He did not give him an introduction. It was something like the Watson deal to settle with the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railway. Watson wanted an introduction to the railroad. Old man Williams wanted an introduction to May in order to get something from the railroad. Judge Archbald said: "No; I will not introduce you exactly. I will write a letter and inquire if we can buy it." He says in his answer that at the time he wrote the letter, or later, he was informed that he and Williams could each make two or three thousand dollars from resale of the dump. Two or three thousand dollars is a good amount of money for a man to make on one little transaction of this kind. The judge had that at stake in pursuing the Erie Railroad Co. for the possession of the option on the Katydid culm dump. And he did pursue it.

Did you ever see such a persistent pursuit of a railroad corporation in your life? Then he wrote May a letter. May finally told him that Vice President Richardson was coming down to Scranton before a great while, and he would take the matter up with him. That was along in May or June. He said: "I will take up this Katydid transaction with him." It is contrary to the policy of the Erie Railroad Co.," he says, "to part with its culm banks, but I will take it up with Richardson, who is the vice president." Mr. May, although unwilling as he was, swore that he did take it up with Richardson in Scranton, and that he and Richardson came to the conclusion that they would not sell the dump.

Senators, it is one point that should be remembered, that after the judge had made this application through old man Williams, the vice president of the road and Mr. May had concluded that they would not sell. The judge did not like that, evidently. He said in his testimony that he did not know that Richardson had been at Scranton and that they had arrived at that conclusion. He further said that Mr. May passed by his office practically every day going to lunch. Yet he did not know that Richardson and May had come to the conclusion that the railroad company would not part with this piece of property. He found that the proposition had been turned down somehow. Old man Williams no doubt was worrying the judge and May, and finally Williams comes back and says, "Judge, I do not believe that we can get this option; May talked very gruff to me."

Now, Senators, the judge has some spirit about him. If you will remember, he showed it on the witness stand. Williams described before Wrisley Brown in Scranton and before the Judiciary Committee before he swore here in the Senate Chamber just exactly what the judge did and said. He said the judge got excited and said, "I know their lawyer, Brownell." Yes, Brownell had just argued this Lighterage case about a month and a half before that before the judge in the Commerce Court. He said, "I know their lawyer, Brownell, and I will go to New York and see him, and I may hurt May." Williams said he did not refer to the Erie Railroad officials. He said, "I may hurt him, May, for refusing so small a favor." Then old man Williams said before Wrisley Brown, when he was fresh from these happenings, "the judge said, 'I have two cases here now that I have just decided for them.'" And he did have two cases lying on his desk, because the judge said yesterday in his testimony he had the record and the briefs of the Lighterage case and the Joint Rate case, to both of which the Erie Railroad Co. was a party defendant, in his office in Scranton. He said, "I have just decided two cases for them." Those cases had been argued and appealed on a preliminary injunction to the Supreme Court.

Old man Williams could not have known, Senators, what were those cases. The judge says, "Lighterage cases." Williams swore that he never knew Brownell's name; he never heard of Brownell. He said, "I never heard of lighterage in my life until the judge then and there described it. 'Lighterage,' he says, 'is these tugboats that haul box cars across the river from New York.'"

Who told him about it? That was told shortly after the Lighterage cases had been decided by the Commerce Court. He said the judge told him about it, and said:

"I will go to see Brownell," the man who argued the cases before him and in whose favor the decision was rendered in the preliminary injunction. "I will see him and may hurt May for not granting this favor."

I may say, Senators, it is perfectly evident to you all that the Judiciary Committee and the managers have been handicapped in this case, because it is apparent that we have had to go to the judge's own friends, companions, and business associates to get this testimony, and the testimony we have gotten has been practically wrung from unwilling witnesses.

Old man Williams goes upon the stand and swore he further saw at some other time the word "lighterage" in a little pamphlet. But, Senators, he said before Wrisley Brown and before the Judiciary Committee that when this Lighterage case was first discussed he saw the cases in a little book, a brief he said. There is no court docket mentioned then. He said, "I saw the brief filed by the lawyers. I took it in my hand." Here are the briefs I hold in my hand. He called them little books. The judge admitted yesterday that at that time he had taken home with him the documents, the records, the briefs in the case.

One of these little books is what old man Williams picked up. It is entitled, "Case No. 38," where the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western and the Lehigh Valley Railroad appeared as defendants. That is what old man Williams swore before Wrisley Brown when the facts were fresh in his mind, and practically what he swore before the Judiciary Committee, and he does not particularly deny it here, except that they bring out the fact that later on, in September, after the option had been secured, after the judge had gone to New York, Williams saw or could have seen in the little trial docket the word "lighterage." I believe Williams saw that, Senators. He was in the judge's office four or five times a week, so he said, for the last three or four years, not only a daily visitor, but often a double daily visitor. He seems to have had privileges there that permitted him to go through the judge's documents and books and look up what railroad cases the judge had pending before his court, and I expect in turning the leaflets of this little trial docket he may have seen the word "lighterage" there.

But, Senators, listen. They do not say that old man Williams has told a falsehood here, because he is the judge's friend and has been the judge's go-between and handmaid for four long years. Williams said that he talked about the Lighterage case before the judge went to New York. He said that positively in several different places. "How long was it after you talked about the Lighterage case that the judge went to New York?" "I do not know. It may have been two weeks, a month."

You can not resist the conclusion, Senators, that Judge Archbald did say to old man Williams, "I will go to New York and see Brownell." Why? Because he did go. One reason, the judge assigns in his answer for going was that he had understood the title of Robertson & Law was in dispute and had been referred to Brownell. When Brownell comes on the witness stand he never mentioned Robertson & Law's interest in it, because at that time Judge Archbald knew Robertson & Law had already given Williams an option on their interest in this bank, and there was no trouble about it.

He says in his answer that that is what he went to see Brownell for. Further on he says he was introduced to Richardson and only called on Richardson for the purpose of "hurrying up the proposition." He never did discuss Robertson & Law with either Brownell or Richardson.

No, Mr. President, the conclusion here is irresistible. This judge, knowing his power, went to New York to see the head officials, Brownell first and then Richardson, for the purpose of compelling them to agree to his proposition to purchase the dump. Why do I say that? Because along in June or July Richardson and May had agreed they would not sell it. Then the judge gets restive and he writes a letter to Brownell. He does not put Brownell's name in the letter either, and if one did not have the envelope you would never know to whom the letter was written.

"MY DEAR SIR: I want to know if you will be in your office the 4th of August. I want to see you on a little business"—Something of that sort. Brownell immediately writes back, "Come." Brownell said, "I have nothing to do with Richardson's business; I will introduce you to Vice President Richardson." On the 25th of August May went to New York to see Richardson, and, among other things, he discussed the Katydid proposition with Richardson, which proposition they had turned down two months before. "Richardson and I talked the matter over, and I went back to Scranton on the 26th of August, and on the 29th of August I saw the judge."

The judge makes the impression that May knew he was financially interested in this proposition. I tell you, Senators, this evidence will convince you that the judge knew he was doing wrong, and he kept his name out of all this transaction until after he had secured the option from the litigants in his court. May, a man who had been walking in front of the judge's door for many months and years called on the judge and said, "Judge, send Mr. Williams around; I will give him that option." Why did he not say to the judge, "Judge, we have agreed to give you and Mr. Williams the option. I will make it out to you"? No, sir; the judge calls in Williams and says, "Go up to May. Now we can get it. I have been to New York and I have seen Richardson and Brownell." Williams says the judge told him to go, and "May likes you very much; go up and you can get it." He then goes and does get the option; and he gets it in whose name? He gets it in E. J. Williams's name. The judge is still concealed, although he says he expects to make two or three thousand dollars out of the option. On the 4th of September, when they secured the option from Robertson & Law, which had theretofore been verbal, the judge draws it to Williams anew, and he does not put his own name in it. There they have given an option to Williams, a handmaid, a go-between, a dummy, in which the judge expects to reap a financial profit of two or three thousand dollars, or it may be more.

Now, mark you, he writes to this very same man, May, on the 29th of November, though he has stated that he thinks May knew that he was financially interested in it; but listen to that letter of the 29th day of November. I think I will take the time of the Senate to read just a little of it to show you that he was even concealing from Capt. May the fact that he was financially interested in this transaction. After the option had been granted by May to Williams on November 29, two months later, he writes to Capt. May:

"MY DEAR CAPT. MAY: I have closed a deal on behalf of Mr. Williams for the Katydid culm dump—

Why did he not say to May, "We have closed a sale"? He kept the fact concealed from poor old May that he was financially interested in it, and made May come up and deliver to this man, Williams, through his influence with the New York office with Richardson. There is no other conclusion that you can reach, Senators, from the testimony in the case. The judge practically compelled Richardson to order May to reverse his position and give the judge the option he coveted.

The Marian Coal Co. proposition, Senators, is along the same line. Who first suggested Watson's name? This same old fellow, Williams. He goes to one of the Bolands and says, "You employ George M. Watson; he can settle your case." Boland gets Watson, and where does Watson go? He goes to Judge Archbald, of the United States Commerce Court, when he knew that that judge had at that time the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. in his power in three ways; because the Marian Coal Co.'s case was pending in the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was liable to be appealed to Judge Archbald's court; the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. was a party defendant in the lighterage case; and the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western was interested in the Meeker case, which lowered the rates upon coal by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that case, too, was then pending in the Commerce Court. There were three ways in which this company—the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western—were interested, and the judge knew it.

Then he sets about with this man Watson, who says—even Watson, a man of his type, in his testimony says—that he got very mad when anyone suggested that he would associate with a man like E. J. Williams. He says that in his testimony. Then Watson goes to the judge, who has these railroads in his power. Senators, did you ever hear of a man in your life, in high or low official position, doing what this judge has done and in the persistent manner in which he did it for mere personal friendly motives? I do not care what his intent was; the conduct itself is bad. The first thing he did was to call up Loomis, the vice president of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western, on the telephone. He could not get Loomis. Then Loomis swears that he saw the judge on the street in Scranton, and the judge told him that the Marian Coal Co. case would be a good case to settle with the Bolands—"intimated," I believe the word is—that it would be a good thing to settle it; and to see whom? To see Watson. Then on the 4th day of August, the very day he went in to see Brownell about the Katydid dump deal with the Erie Railroad Co., he goes over to see Mr. Loomis, the vice president of the Dalaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co., in behalf of Watson, who was employed to settle the Marian case with the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad.

Then, Mr. President, Mr. Loomis swore that at some time between the 1st of September and the 5th day of October the judge called on him again in New York to ask how they were getting along with the settlement. Then, on September 27, the judge, after these persistent interviews and discussions, gets a letter from Mr. Loomis saying that he does not think there is any possibility of a settlement. Ordinarily, if he had stopped there, it would not have looked so bad, but he sits down and writes: "I am very much disappointed that you can not settle this case, and I shall still hope that there is some way of settling it." He writes that to Loomis. That was on the 27th day of September. On the 30th day of September he calls up Mr. Phillips, the superintendent of the coal company owned by the railway, and says, "I want to see you." Phillips says, "All right, I will see you in the morning." The morning came and Phillips forgot it. Then at lunch the judge called him up again and said, "You forgot that appointment with me to-day, and I want to see you." "All right, Judge, I will call upon you this afternoon." "No," the judge replied, "I am going to take a walk; come to-night"; and for the first time in the life of Reese A. Phillips he called at Judge Archbald's home to discuss the settlement of this $161,000 claim against the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co., and went over the whole matter with him. Phillips tells him there is no chance of a settlement; that all that they think is due would be $3,000 in excess coal rates on account of the Meaker case, and $11,000 for the value of the washery, making it $14,000, I believe. The judge said to Phillips, "It seems you are a long way apart." And, mark you, then Watson, on the 2d of October, either by letter or by personal conversation, states to Judge Archbald, "I have written to Truesdale and to Loomis asking for a conference as quick as possible in this case"—a personal conference. Then the judge follows that up with a letter to Loomis of October 3, in which he says, "There is nothing like a personal conference in these matters." In a letter to Loomis before that he says, "I would volunteer my personal services if I thought it were possible to accomplish a settlement of this case"—between litigants then in his court. Then, when the conference was held on the 5th of October, "There is no chance of getting together. It is ridiculous," the railroad officials say, "to ask us $161,000 for this proposition." Mr. Boland says that the judge knew that a hundred thousand dollars was to be the maximum. "It is ridiculous; we will not discuss it at all." But old man Watson says, "Why, remember the Meeker case; it is pending in the Commerce Court now"; and the suggestion was that Judge Archbald was to pass upon the Meeker case. "If he sustains the Interstate Commerce Commission the Meeker case will cut the freight rates on coal on your road—the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western—as well as the others, and you had better look out. Not only that, but you are now parties in his court in the Lighterage case; and not only that, but this case we are trying to settle may go to his court by appeal from the Interstate Commerce Commission." That is the conclusion.

Senators, there never was a more powerful chain of circumstances where judicial influence was brought to bear upon a set of railroad officials in this country than that which is shown in this Delaware, Lackawanna & Western case. I can not understand for the life of me how frail mortal men, like Loomis and Truesdale, failed to "stand and deliver."

After they broke up that conference on the 5th of October with no settlement, what happened? Old man Watson goes to his guide, "I must go to the man who is engineering this deal." The next day he wired down to Washington to the judge, "What time can I see you to-morrow in Washington?" The judge promptly wires back to him, "Almost any time." Then Watson wires back, "Will be at the Raleigh Hotel to-morrow afternoon at 1.30; leave instructions." The judge knew that the conference was going on.

Old man Watson, you will find if you will read the testimony, swore at least five different times that he did not come to Washington after that conference; that he came here before the conference to get the brief in the Meeker case, which was produced at the hearing before the Judiciary Committee. The brief that he claimed he had gotten on the 7th of October was not filed until the 9th day of October in the Commerce Court, and the judge must have sent it to him, I imagine from his testimony the other day, after the brief had been filed. The fact is, that after this conference broke up he wanted the judge to use still more pressure and more power to bring a settlement about. This man Watson saw from $5,000 to $61,000, whichever way you may look at it, slipping away from his greedy hands. He says in his testimony that his train was, I believe, an hour late, and when he got to Washington, although it was raining, the weather was bad, and he was to have been here at 1.30, he found the judge patiently waiting for him at the Raleigh Hotel.

That was not the end of it. The judge goes further. After that conference, which he brought about—and these railroad officials say they had it on account of this judge—that was not all. The judge still pursued it. He saw Loomis again in an effort to get him to make some final settlement or offer; and on the 13th of November he writes, "My Dear Christy, I have seen our friend"—I guess he referred to Mr. Loomis—"and there is no chance for a settlement of the case."

Senators, I wish I had the time to discuss all the other remaining articles. I think the Rissinger matter, the signing of the $2,500 note, the acquisition of stock in the Honduras gold-mining scheme, is one of the ugliest charges in this entire body of articles. The judge admits in his answer that during the time the old Plymouth case was pending in which Rissinger was interested negotiations were going on between him and Rissinger about sales of the Honduras stock, but he says in his answer a little later that he understood that his indorsement was simply as an accommodation. How would you, Senators, like to be innocently and openly prosecuting a suit in a United States court when you knew that your adversary was in the private chambers of the judge making with him deals for stock, wherein he used nothing to purchase it but his name as a judge, which is worth nothing in commercial channels because they never got the money until they had to take a judgment note against Mrs. Hutchinson and Rissinger before they got it. What Rissinger was after was the influence of this judge in those cases which were pending. He formed his little corporation on November 10 and during the time when the case was pending involving $25,000 Rissinger was in the private chambers of this judge discussing with him the details of a scheme down in some foreign country absolutely unknown to the defendant in the case. After the case was decided in Rissinger's favor, then he does sign up the note, then the $2,500 is secured, and the judge is passed over $1,680 worth of stock, for which he never paid a cent, never has paid a cent, and it was never intended that he should pay a cent. It was a pure gift in order to influence this judge in those cases, or at least to get in his good graces.

In regard to Packer No. 3, Senators, if the judge had secured it from the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.—I have made some figures which, with the permission of the Senate, I will insert in connection with that proposition—he would have made $125,000 a year. There were 521,000 tons of coal, of which they would have washed and prepared 500 tons a day—a whole trainload per day.

The judge expected to transport that coal to market, and under the ordinary price of coal he would have made something between $250,000 and $300,000 on that 521,000 tons of coal.

Enough evidence has been adduced here to prove that the railroad companies hold to coal properties like grim death; they do not turn them loose until they are compelled to do so, either under the law or under the influence of some judge of a high court, as in this case.

It looks to me, Senators, from all the pipes the judge was running out, from all the wires he was setting, from all the financial deals out of which he was preparing to make money here, yonder, and everywhere, that the judge thought the Commerce Court was going to be abolished and he was going to get into a business where he could make money rapidly, because he spent practically the whole of 1911 in preparing these coal-dump deals and making propositions to the railroads about securing their coal properties and settling lawsuits with them.

Mr. President, several times in the history of our country judges have been called before this great bar to account for their conduct, and in every case of conviction the charges were far less grave than those made and proved in the case before us to-day. One of the early impeachments was that of Judge Addison, who was impeached and convicted in Pennsylvania in 1802 on two charges, to wit:

"First. Directing the jury that the address of an associate judge to them had nothing to do with the question before them.

"Second. Preventing the associate judge from addressing the grand jury concerning their duties, and by denying the right and by leaving the bench, and thus irregularly adjourning court."

Judge Pickering was impeached and convicted by the United States Senate in 1804 for ordering a ship to be restored to a claimant without producing a certificate for the payment of duty, for refusing to hear testimony of witnesses produced to sustain the claim, and refusing an appeal from the decree which he had rendered.

Judge Humphreys was a United States district judge in 1862, and was convicted by the United States Senate on the following charge:

"For neglecting and refusing to hold the district court of the United States."

It is claimed, Mr. President, that this judge did not possess the evil motive in all of these transactions which ordinary men must necessarily attribute to him after knowing the admitted facts. This plea can not excuse a person occupying his high position. He ought not to have committed acts which in the minds of ordinary men would scandalize his office and bring his official character into disrepute. Upon the admitted facts in the respondent's answer I believe he should be found guilty and removed from office. There is a maxim of law expressed in Latin, res ipsa loquitur; that is, the thing itself speaks. True, that doctrine is usually applied in damage suits when, certain facts being proved or admitted, negligence is presumed, and so in this case all the ugly facts being admitted by respondent in his answer they, per se, constitute the opposite of good behavior, regardless of motive, and render him liable to forfeiture of his office. We are told in Holy Writ that—

"Uzzah put forth his hand to the ark of God and took hold of it for the oxen shook it. And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Uzzah; and God smote him there for his error, and there he died by the ark of God."

In that case Uzzah's intentions were not only not bad, but were positively good. What he did was innocently done, but his acts were a sin in the sight of Jehovah. But no such innocent motive moved Judge Archbald in all of his devious transactions. He knew the power of his high office, and he knew his own power because he held that office; he was conscious of it at every step; he kept his high position posted before the eyes of the litigants in his court by constant correspondence upon stationery on which were the awe-inspiring words "R. W. Archbald, judge, United States Commerce Court, Washington." Every railroad president, every railroad counsel, and every railroad superintendent instinctively realized, upon receipt of such correspondence, the power and position of the respondent, and peculiarly so in this case, for these railroads were at that very time to a certain extent within the power of this judge because they were parties to suits then pending in his court, and he knew it.

Judge Grover, a splendid man and great judge, of high character, who sat upon the impeachment case of George G. Barnard, in voting upon the question of disqualifying Judge Barnard from holding office, said:

"Upon the trial of important civil causes he has fairly and uprightly discharged the duty of a just judge according to the best of his ability. The errors into which he has fallen are somewhat akin to some of the nobler virtues. I think that the votes upon these articles show that the errors into which he has fallen have originated from attachment to friends, from the idea that upon the bench he had the right to remember who were his friends and who were his enemies. I hope that the result of this trial will not only solemnize every judge in this State, every man clothed with a public trust under the Government, that all will have impressed upon their minds when they assume any function in behalf of the public that all selfish considerations are to be discarded, all their ends the public good. The respondent's desire to aid friends has led to grave errors—errors, in my judgment, inexcusable. The evidence has satisfied me that Judge Barnard, although possessed of those genial qualities that have surrounded him with strongly attached friends, was destitute of some qualities essential to the judicial character. It is possible, if he had committed these offenses in a legislative or administrative capacity, I might be satisfied by removal only; but in that position where the greatest integrity is to be exercised, where none should turn either to the right or to the left in the discharge of duty, from any consideration whatever, where the only inquiry should be, What is the law, what is right, and act accordingly. In this case, with the kindest feelings toward Judge Barnard, I am compelled to vote in the affirmative."

In that case, Senators, Judge Barnard was impeached upon the sole charge of partiality. How much more grievous are the charges which we have proven against the respondent in this trial!

I yield to no one in my reverence and respect for the splendid judges who have illumined and adorned the annals of our judicial history. When the roll of the names of Marshall, Taney, Miller, Brewer, Harlan, and Fuller is called, my pulse quickens and my blood warms because I am one of their countrymen and "have a share in the heritage of their fame," but what a far cry it is from one of these great men to the respondent at the bar! Can you imagine that any one of these, during the wildest and most indiscreet moment of their lives, would ever have descended from their high position to the low plane of dickering and trafficking for private gain with parties who had suits pending in their courts?

Mr. President, the history of the American judiciary is a glorious record, which makes every citizen of this country proud. "It is a heritage priceless in value and belonging to us all. Lapse of years but adds to our reverence for Marshall and Story, Kent and Miller, Taney and Field. Amidst the conflicts of parties and principles, which raged so furiously around them, they were calm and just in wisdom and conservatism, declaring the law as they believed it to be, with an independence which knew no fear. Around some of them clouds and darkness gathered, but they soon passed away."

> "As some tall cliff that lifts its awful form
> Swells from the vale and midway leaves the storm,
> Though round its head the rolling cloud is spread,
> Eternal sunshine settles on its head."

So long as judicial independence shall be admired, so long as judicial purity shall be respected, so long as judicial propriety shall be demanded, so long as justice shall be the genius of our civilization, just so long will the names of our great jurists remain embalmed in sacred memory and continue the pride of bench and bar and the glory of American institutions.

In all ages and in all climes where civilized man has dwelt he has been ever watchful in endeavoring to choose judges among the most upright, honest, and just of men—men of poise, incorruptibility, and discretion, who well understand and appreciate the dignity and proprieties of their office.

It should be burned into the minds and hearts and souls of the judges throughout the United States that they should avoid everything that brings disgrace, scandal, and disrepute upon their high office, so that whatever other branches of our Government may at times lose the confidence of any portion of our population, the judiciary may ever stand as an immaculate bulwark against the enemies of a republican form of government. Whenever a judge violates this motto, that very moment the magic of his judicial power is gone, and "it loses for itself those princely attributes with which it is by the Constitution invested."

The moment a high judge dares to use his office directly or remotely for private gain "that moment he loses the respect of the community." Let the standard of judicial ethics in this great country be so high that every judge may deserve Webster's encomium on Chief Justice Jay, when he said:

"When the judicial ermine fell upon his shoulders it touched a being as spotless as itself."

That was no absurd fiction of the noble Romans who instituted the vestal virgins to keep burning forever the fires of Roman liberty. Her liberty never expired until that noble sisterhood was dragged down and corrupted; and so, too, the fires of our liberty will never be extinguished so long as our judges remain incorruptible and possess with undying tenacity judicial rectitude and propriety, according to the eternal fitness of things, and in keeping with that which is best and noblest among the established principles of mankind.

Mr. President, to paraphrase somewhat the language of Judge Spencer, of New York, one of the managers in the impeachment of Judge Peck: I desire to say that the House of Representatives and the Judiciary Committee of that body, after long, patient, and full examination of all the evidence in the case, came to the unanimous resolution that Judge Archbald should be impeached, and by a vote of 223 to 1 sent us to your bar to demand that he be convicted; and happily, Senators, indeed, the record will show you an absolute absence of all party feeling. Could I feel in the remotest degree that the baleful influence of partisanship had mingled with the action of the committee or the House of Representatives, I declare unto you that no earthly consideration could have prevailed upon me to appear here as one of the prosecutors in this trial. I have no language to express the abhorrence of my soul at the indulgence of such unhallowed feelings on such solemn occasions. I believe in the long annals of impeachment trials in this great body that the charges against the respondent here are freer from the slightest tinge of partisanship than any case ever presented to this high court, and in this fact you, Senators, the House of Representatives, and the people of the United States are to be congratulated.

You are to say, Senators, by your verdict whether you will send this man, Judge Robert W. Archbald, back to his high seat on the bench of the United States Commerce Court and whether you approve or disapprove his conduct in all the transactions alleged in the various articles in this case. If you acquit him, your verdict will be construed as an indorsement of his conduct, and the people will be powerless; but, sirs, how can you render such a verdict in the face of even the admitted facts in the case? Surely the time has not arrived in the history of this great Government when judges of high courts shall be licensed to traffic with litigants in their courts, to make with such litigants advantageous private bargains, and to increase their personal fortunes by such nefarious practices. Senators, if that shall be the result of your verdict—and you must admit that such a conclusion may be justly drawn from a verdict of acquittal—then I declare unto you that I shudder when I contemplate the future of my country. Such practices on the part of judges will open wide the door to judicial reprisals, blackmail, and plunder, and very soon, as in the days of Rome, when justice was bought and sold with shameful boldness, this splendid Government, constructed and cemented by the blood and sacrifices of our forefathers, will totter and stagger to its fall.

And now, Senators, my task, though imperfectly performed, is at an end; the greater duty devolves upon you, and I believe that your verdict will mark an epoch in our history and will have a tremendous influence upon the perpetuity and stability of our liberties and our institutions, and even upon the life of the Republic itself. The people of the United States are now demanding, possibly as never before, the strictest rectitude on the part of their judges. Can you imagine that any district or State would elect this respondent to the high position which he now holds with all this testimony against him fresh in their minds? I ask you, Senators, who are the appointive power of Federal judges, would you confirm this judge in the first instance were he nominated and his name sent to you for confirmation if all this evidence stood out against him, or evidence parallel or akin thereto? I do not believe that a man with such a record could receive one vote in favor of his confirmation from this great Senate.

Whatever reputation the respondent may once have had for impartiality or judicial rectitude is now gone. His usefulness as a judge is at an end. He has prostituted the office which you gave him in his worship of mammon; he has sacrificed his judicial integrity and official rectitude on the altar of greed. He has sorely violated the common rules of judicial ethics and propriety. Hence we, the representatives of the people, speaking for them and in their name, demand that R. W. Archbald shall be removed from office under the Government of the United States.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, of the remainder of the time Mr. Manager FLOYD will occupy 1 hour and 9 minutes; Mr. Manager HOWLAND will occupy 45 minutes, and the balance of the time, to wit, 2 hours and 30 minutes, will be reserved for the closing argument on the part of the managers.

ARGUMENT OF MR. FLOYD, ONE OF THE MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. Manager FLOYD. Mr. President, it is never a pleasant task for me to appear in the rôle of a prosecutor against anyone. It is a peculiarly unpleasant task to appear against one holding high position like the respondent in this case, but I come here not at my own instance; I come here as one of the managers under a command from the House of Representatives, and the House of Representatives is acting not alone for itself, but in behalf of all the people of the United States. We are here to discharge a public duty, and whatever might be our sympathies for the respondent, they should not swerve us in the discharge of a solemn duty.

The question at issue before the Senate is, Has the respondent, under the Constitution, committed high crimes and misdemeanors for which he should be removed from office? The managers who have preceded me have referred to many of the charges in the articles of impeachment, but there are one or two which they have omitted to mention to which I wish to call attention in the course of my remarks; but first I desire to discuss a little more in detail article No. 2, which I regard as one of the most important and one of the gravest charges in all the articles of impeachment brought against the respondent in this case.

In order that you may better understand the particular point I have in mind, I want to call attention to a phase of the pleadings pertaining to article No. 2 and article No. 13 that is not found in regard to any of the others. Under the pleadings in this case it is remarkable that practically all of the allegations of fact contained in the 13 specifications and articles of impeachment are admitted save and except as to article No. 2 and to that part of article No. 13 which relates to the same charge that is contained in article No. 2.

It is admitted in the answer that Judge Archbald was judge of the Commerce Court; it is admitted that these railroad companies with which he was dealing were at the time parties litigant in suits Nos. 38 and 39, that were pending in the Commerce Court. His interest is admitted in the Katydid transaction, and he was to share in the profits; it is admitted under article No. 10, which has not been alluded to, I believe, by any of the managers preceding me, that in 1910 he made a trip to Europe at the expense of Henry W. Cannon, a rich relative of his wife; it is admitted that on the same occasion a number of lawyers who practiced in the judge's court made up a purse of $525 in money and delivered it to him in person on board of the ship on the day he was ready to sail; it is admitted in the transaction concerning Packer No. 3 that he was to become a member of that company; it is admitted that in the Warnke deal he received a note of $500 and shared it with John Henry Jones. But when it comes to No. 2 the fact of his interest is denied. Now, why?

I want to call attention in this connection to the judge's own testimony when questioned on cross-examination concerning his interest in the Jones Coal Co., a corporation which it was proposed to organize to operate Packer No. 3, sought to be acquired from the Girard estate and the Lehigh Valley Coal Co.

On page 1249 of the record in this case in speaking of the Jones Coal Co. that was to be organized, for which Mr. Farrell, of New York, was to put up all the money and of which Judge Archbald was to become a member, Judge Archbald gave this testimony:

Q. You were to get a fourth of the balance?—A. About a fourth of the balance; yes.

Q. Why were you to have any interest in that stock?

And the answer of Judge Archbald is—

Why not?

Q. Well, why not, after you had gone to see Mr. Warriner; is that your idea?—A. I see no reason why, after organizing that company, that enterprise, I was not entitled to a share. It would be very strange if I did not have a share.

Q. Why?—A. Because I was instrumental, in part, in organizing the company, getting it up. It was in part my scheme and part Mr. Jones's.

These several transactions in which the judge participated—I mean these culm-dump transactions and these attempted sales are all similar in character.

In article No. 2 it is charged that the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. was a party to cases, dockets Nos. 38 and 39, in the Commerce Court, and that is established and admitted; but the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. was a party to the same suits, and Judge Archbald did not hesitate to go to Mr. Warriner, the vice president of the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., and secure a contract and agreement with a view of securing a lease from the Girard estate and operating that culm dump by the Jones Coal Co., the one to which I have just referred. Mr. Warriner was also the vice president of the Lehigh Valley Railroad.

The Lehigh Valley Railroad was a party to those suits pending in the Commerce Court. Then, the fact that the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. was a party to these same suits does not explain why Judge Archbald washed his hands of this transaction when he admits his interest in the other. The Erie Railroad Co. was a party to the same suits, dockets No. 38 and No. 39. Judge Archbald did not scruple to see Mr. Brownell and Mr. Richardson and Mr. May and secure a contract from them, in which he admits that he was to share in the profits.

Then, in the judge's own language, when it comes to the Watson transaction, when we come to consider the facts charged in article No. 2, wherein the question is raised as to whether or not Judge Archbald was to share in the profits of that transaction, let me repeat his answer to the other question, "Why not?" How do you differentiate that case from the others? Now, was he to share in the profits? I am frank to admit that we have been unable to show by any direct and affirmative testimony that fact; but we have circumstances in this case which tend to establish that fact. Judge Archbald was participating in these transactions, was engaging in them for the purpose of making profits for himself. You can not differentiate between these several deals and transactions in such way as to make it improper for him to receive a consideration or be interested in this Watson deal any more than in the others. They were all of a kind. What was the proposition? The proposition was to sell two-thirds of the stock of the Marian Coal Co. to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. for $100,000, and the Bolands, stockholders in the Marian Coal Co., agreed to pay George M. Watson a specific fee of $5,000 if he could make that trade. Now, if Judge Archbald will accept $500 for the services that he rendered in the Warnke transaction, the case of the Premier Coal Co., why would he not accept one-half of the $5,000 in the Marian Coal Co. case?

The circumstances concerning that transaction are peculiar. The Marian Coal Co. was represented before the Interstate Commerce Commission by an attorney, Mr. H. C. Reynolds, who appeared and testified in this case. From every appearance he is an able lawyer. Mr. Watson was hired for a specific service, and that was to bring about this settlement. And Mr. Williams, according to Mr. Boland, is the man who first suggested to Mr. Boland that if he would see George Watson that Mr. Watson was in position to settle this controversy with the railroad company.

Let us see who brought it to the attention of the railroad company. Take the testimony of Mr. E. E. Loomis, vice president and general manager of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. He testified that the first he ever heard of Watson in this transaction or of Watson's ability to bring about a settlement was when Judge Archbald met him on the streets of Scranton and suggested to him that he thought the differences between the Marian Coal Co. and the railroad company ought to be settled outside of court. Mr. Loomis says he said to him, "Judge, it is the policy of our company to settle all matters outside of court whenever we can do so on a fair basis." Mr. Loomis says that Judge Archbald replied, "If you will see George Watson, an attorney of Scranton, I think he is in position to settle this controversy on a fair basis." And according to Mr. Loomis's testimony he took the matter up with his officers, had them investigate the property and make report to him, and about the 27 or 28th of September notified Judge Archbald of the result. The railroad officials turned down the proposition. Then an appeal was made by Watson on the 2d of October, and by Judge Archbald on the 3d of October, to Mr. Loomis for a further hearing with Mr. Loomis and Mr. Truesdale, Mr. Truesdale being the president of the company. That hearing was arranged, and on the 5th of October they held a meeting in Scranton for the express purpose of hearing Mr. Watson and hearing his proposition, and determining whether or not they could settle on the basis proposed by him. Now, what was his proposition? His proposition was $161,000. It was disagreed to.

But what was the contract with Watson? According to the testimony of Mr. C. G. Boland and of Mr. W. P. Boland the contract was that if he could secure a settlement for $100,000 they would sell their entire interest in the Marian Coal Co. to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co., and that would settle the whole controversy, because when the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. had acquired control of that corporation the suit the Marian Coal Co. had against that railroad before the Interstate Commerce Commission would be not under the control of the Bolands, but the railroad would own the property and the lawsuit. Having control of the lawsuit by having acquired ownership of the corporation, they could end the controversy by dismissing the suit.

Now, Mr. Watson, whose testimony was taken before the Judiciary Committee and which was introduced in evidence by counsel for respondent, admits in his testimony before the Judiciary Committee that the original proposition was $100,000 and that he was to receive a fee of $5,000 in the event he secured the settlement. But that proposition was never made to the railroad people. Why the raise? The only testimony that we have upon that point is the statement made by Watson to W. P. and C. G. Boland, when they asked him why it was that he was raising the consideration from $100,000 to $161,000. He made the statement that Judge Archbald was to be a powerful factor in the settlement of that case, and that it was his purpose or his intention, if he secured the settlement, to share one-fourth of all in excess of the $95,000 with Judge Archbald.

Did the judge intend to take it? He was asked on the stand the other day whether he had a specific agreement with Mr. Williams about that Katydid proposition, and Mr. Williams was asked particularly about that. Neither would say that previously there had been made any specific agreement. Judge Archbald, when asked about it on the stand, said that he assumed he was to share in the profits—assumed it. We may well assume that he was to share in the profits of the Watson deal. Now, if he would share in the profits in that transaction, why would he refuse to share in the profits of the larger transaction if it had been consummated? Why does he deny that charge, that particular point in that charge? Because it is material; because the demand that was made by Mr. Watson in excess of the amount that the Bolands had agreed to take—$61,000—was so unconscionable, both in morals and in trade, that he dared not admit his interest in that transaction.

So I am disposed to stand here and insist that the circumstances in this case tend to the conclusion that had that transaction been consummated, Judge Archbald would have been as ready to accept money from Watson as he had been from Warnke or the Premier Coal Co.

Let me call your attention to the peculiar way in which the judge got his money from the Premier Coal Co. Now, as has already been alluded to by Mr. Manager WEBB, it seems that the judge had a good many partners or associates in these deals. There was Edward J. Williams. He was mixed up in the Katydid. He was the first man who suggested Watson to the Bolands. There was John Henry Jones. John Henry Jones, it seems, was concerned in some way in this Warnke deal or Warnke transaction. John Henry Jones testifies that after the contract had been closed and the sale had been made to the Premier Coal Co. he went to Mr. Warnke and demanded his commission of $500. John Henry Jones's theory was that he was entitled to it; that he had had something to do with the bringing together of the parties. Warnke refused to pay John Henry Jones. Then Judge Archbald goes in person to the officers of the Premier Coal Co. and demands a commission of $500, and they execute a note for $510, the $10 being added for the discount, and the judge accepts it, and then divides the $500, according to his testimony, with John Henry Jones. What was the consideration?

He had no option on the property at that time, according to John W. Berry. He had previously had an option. But for some unexplained, undefined service on the part of the judge in regard to that transaction, he demands and receives a note, a bankable note, for $510, which he discounts at the bank for $500 in cash.

If he will receive money under such circumstances and for such considerations, under all the circumstances in this case, what reason is there for us to conclude that he was acting purely for friendship in this transaction concerning the Marian Coal Co.? He was charging for services rendered in connection with other deals and transactions, and the evidence discloses that fact. He rendered far more service, so far as actual work was concerned, in his efforts to bring about a settlement of the Marian Coal Co. disputes with the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western than he did in other transactions in which he participated.

What did he do to secure his interest in the Katydid? He wrote to Capt. May a letter on the 31st of March; went to see Mr. Brownell in New York on the 4th of August; had a short conference with Mr. Richardson on the same day that he saw Mr. Brownell; returned to Scranton, met Capt. May on the street, and May told him that they were ready to make that deal and to send Williams around. Williams went around and got the contract. That is the service that the judge rendered in regard to the Katydid proposition, for which he proposed to share equally in the contract.

But what did he do to bring about a negotiation or settlement in which he and Watson were interested? Some facts are developed by the respondent himself that are not disclosed by Mr. Loomis. It appears from the respondent's own testimony that he first endeavored to get the Lackawanna Railroad people interested in this transaction on the 4th of August when he was in New York to hold court and to see Brownell. He also went, at Watson's instance, on the same date, to see Mr. Loomis. But in some way that circumstance does not seem to have impressed Loomis, and the first conversation that Loomis detailed was the conversation on the streets of Scranton when the judge again brought up the subject.

Then Mr. Loomis testifies that later, between the 1st of September and the 5th of October, when the matter was hanging fire, while he was awaiting the report of his engineers and his agents, Judge Archbald again appeared in his office in New York and inquired about the matter, and Loomis told him in that conversation that he had had his officers and agents looking up the data and as soon as he got the information desired he would make report. And he did.

Mr. Phillips reported to Mr. Loomis on the 27th of September. On the day following Mr. Loomis reported to Judge Archbald by letter that they could not make the settlement. Then Judge Archbald writes a letter regretting the failure to bring about the settlement, in which, to my mind, he makes a very significant statement. He tells Mr. Loomis that "if I thought it would do any good I would volunteer my direct services in the premises."

A conference is held on the 5th of October. Nothing comes of it. Then on the 6th of October, or on the following day, Mr. Watson wires Judge Archbald that he is coming to Washington, and on the way sends him a second wire telling him where he will be. They have a conference in Washington over the same matter. This occurred the day after, or the second day after, the conference was held in Scranton, where these officials of the railroad had rejected the proposition made by Watson, and then, even as late as the 13th of November, we find Judge Archbald writing a letter to C. G. Boland returning certain papers and regretting that nothing had come of their effort to secure a settlement. That is the Watson transaction.

We do not charge in articles No. 2 or No. 13 that the consideration alleged was a valuable consideration, although I notice in his answer to article No. 13 he has injected a denial that it was a valuable consideration. But we believe the circumstances in this case show this transaction was similar to the other transactions, and that the only difference between them was the enormity of the demand, the unreasonable demand that was made. But we insist that it is not necessary, in order to establish the judge's guilt under article No. 2, to show that he was to receive a valuable consideration or a money consideration.

Now, let us see; let us consider it with that view and see whether or not, in order to make Judge Archbald guilty of improper conduct or misconduct under that article, it is necessary for us to show that the consideration was a valuable consideration—and keep in mind that we do not charge that it is a valuable consideration; that is not in the charge or in the allegation.

We say that for a consideration he undertook to assist one George Watson, an attorney of Scranton, to bring about that settlement. Under our view of this case, we think it is wholly immaterial whether he was seeking a consideration for himself or seeking to aid an attorney, a friend of his, in securing a pecuniary or money consideration in the premises.

Mr. Watson was not the attorney of the Marian Coal Co. in the litigation which was then pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission. Mr. Reynolds was the attorney of the Marian Coal Co. in that litigation, and he continued throughout the entire controversy to be their attorney.

Our position is that a judge has no more right to use his official position or to use his influence as a judge to compromise litigation and bring about settlements with a view and for the purpose of securing a pecuniary reward or a fee for some attorney who is his friend than he has to undertake the same work for a consideration for himself. There would be this difference: It might be an extenuation of the offense, but it would not be any justification of the offense.

Now, let us see what happened in this very case and see if anyone can justify Judge Archbald's conduct, entirely regardless of the fact as to whether or not he was to share in the $5,000 fee or was to receive any other money consideration. What was the state of the case? The Marian Coal Co. had filed two petitions before the Interstate Commerce Commission. In one of those suits the petition was filed against the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. alone, and in the other suit against the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. and five other railroad companies. One of those suits was in relation to rates and the other for damages for excessive charges alleged to have been collected in the past and for certain other items and damages claimed by the petitioners. Those petitions at the time the judge undertook to bring about this settlement were pending in the Interstate Commerce Commission. He is a judge of the Commerce Court, and that very dispute and controversy that he undertook to settle and compromise may, and most probably will, be taken up before the Commerce Court for determination. If it should go there, let me ask you how can Judge Archbald, who has busied himself, whether for a consideration for himself or for a friend, or without any consideration at all, for a period of time covering from the 4th of August up to the 13th of November, in an effort to bring about a settlement of those disputes and controversies between the coal company and the railroad company, be an impartial arbiter of that controversy when it reaches the Commerce Court? It seems to me that this fact alone should condemn the conduct of the judge as improper, contrary to all ethics, contrary to all right, independently of the question of consideration.

That is the state of the case. There is no escape from it. What will he do after spending months in trying to bring about a settlement, as he says, through his friendship for Watson and through his friendship for Boland, one of the stockholders of the company, when that very controversy comes up for his determination in the court of which he is one of the judges? Is that proper conduct on the part of a judge? He must have been moved by some consideration, some motive; some reason must have prompted him. If he did it to aid Watson in securing that $5,000 fee, then, under the contention of the managers, he prostituted his high office for personal profit and gain for a friend, and he ought to be condemned as a judge for so doing. Can he escape condemnation? What conclusion otherwise can be reached?

We insist that under this article the evidence in this case shows that Judge Archbald was undertaking to accomplish and to bring about a settlement of a matter which he must have known was likely to come before his court. He said in answer to a question propounded to him when he was upon the stand that the reason why he was trying to settle it was to keep it out of the Commerce Court. But he failed to settle it. He had no reason to keep it out of the Commerce Court. Is that proper conduct on the part of a judge?

Oh, it seems to me that a judge ought not to undertake in any such way as the testimony in this case discloses he undertook, to bring about that Watson settlement, to bring about a settlement of any disputes and controversies that may arise in his court.

Keep in mind that the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. was a party to the suits, docket Nos. 38 and 39, then pending in the Commerce Court.

The judge does not seem to think that that would make any difference. He does not seem to think that anybody would consider that in making a deal with him. It seems to me that the first thought of men who are approached by a United States circuit judge for deals and contracts, whether they were willing to make them or not, would be to seriously consider the proposition through fear that a refusal might incur the judge's displeasure.

A judge as an operator and dealer in culm dumps and coal properties occupies a very commanding position. He might reward his enemies. He might render favors to his friends.

The transactions that have been detailed in this evidence come very closely to that statute of the United States which defines the crime of bribery of judges. We do not specifically charge in any of these articles of impeachment that the judge is guilty of bribery, but on account of the peculiar character of these several transactions I want to read into the record at this point that statute which pertains to the bribery of judges. It is section 132 of the Criminal Code, and it reads as follows:

SEC. 132. Whoever, being a judge of the United States, shall in anywise accept or receive any sum of money, or other bribe, present, or reward, or any promise, contract, obligation, gift, or security for the payment of money, or for the delivery or conveyance of anything of value, with the intent to be influenced thereby in any opinion, judgment, or decree in any suit, controversy, matter, or cause depending before him, or because of any such opinion, ruling, decision, judgment, or decree, shall be fined not more than $20,000 or imprisoned not more than 15 years, or both.

What is the judge in these transactions doing? Procuring contracts. What additional evidence will be necessary to put the judge under the clear purview of that bribery statute in this case, simply to show that he intended to be influenced in some decision thereby, or that he was receiving these gifts, rewards, presents, agreements, or contracts in consideration of some opinion that he had previously rendered?

I desire to call attention in this connection to article 11. I want to mention just very briefly articles 10 and 11. Article No. 10 charges that the respondent made a trip to Europe at the expense of one Henry W. Cannon. Article No. 11 charges that at the time of his departure he accepted as a gift from certain lawyers a purse of money to the amount of $525. I desire to discuss that proposition briefly. I am not going to contend that that is a bribe under the statute I have read you, but I want to call your attention to the circumstances surrounding this transaction, because, while we do not claim that it was an open bribe, we do claim that it was such gross misconduct as no judge of any court ought ever to be guilty of.

He accepted a purse of $525. The circumstances under which that purse was delivered are peculiar and remarkable. It seems that some lawyers, friends of the judge, first got together in Philadelphia and discussed the matter. I believe Mr. Warren, of the firm of Willard, Warren & Knapp, was the first who suggested it. Then they designated Mr. Searle, the clerk of Judge Archbald's court, to the duty of getting the funds together. First, they consulted Mr. Searle, and Mr Searle said that he did not think the judge, under the circumstances, would refuse it. Then they get the money together and they get Judge Searle, a different Searle from the clerk, a judge of the State court at that time, to go to New York. Mr. Searle, the clerk of the court, who had gotten the money together, accepted a contribution from Judge Searle, which was paid by check, delivers all the money to Judge Searle, and asks him to go to the ship and deliver it in a sealed envelope marked "R. W. Archbald; sailing orders; not to be opened until two days at sea." Judge Searle, the State judge who presented the purse, testifies that he knew that it contained money, but he did not know how much. He did not know whether it contained $500 or $5,000. It is delivered in that way.

Now, here is the document. It is peculiar. I call your attention to the fact that it is typewritten. There is no letterhead on the paper; no place is named.

APRIL 16, 1910.

DEAR JUDGE: This is a greeting of your appreciative friends of the bar of Lackawanna, in the middle district, wishing you bon voyage.

Rather than fruit, books, or flowers, we trust you will be willing to accept this as our hearts' desire for your pleasure and enjoyment in your more than well-earned outing.

May all happiness attend you and yours.

There is no name. Judge Archbald's name does not appear upon it. No money is mentioned. Is not that strange? Not flowers, not fruit, not books. What ought the letter to contain? The judge's name is not mentioned. The money is not mentioned. The place from which it was written is not mentioned. Then there is a list of the lawyers, all signed in typewriting except one, Judge Searle.

I have already stated that we are not insisting that the evidence in support of this article of impeachment sustains the charge of bribery under the law, but we are insisting that it does show gross impropriety and misconduct on the part of Judge Archbald in accepting any such gift.

I do not know who was responsible for the particular arrangement carried out. Of course, the judge was not, because he was in New York preparing for the trip; but I want to say that the man who got that money together and addressed that envelope and fixed up that letter must have been an old hand and an adept at that kind of business. He does not disclose where the letter was written from; he does not disclose on the face of the letter that it contains one cent of money; he does not disclose the name of the person to whom it is to be delivered; and he gets a State judge to deliver the purse to a Federal judge on board a ship ready to sail.

I do not see much opportunity for anybody to get indicted, either under State or Federal jurisdiction, for bribery by reason of that transaction in and about Scranton. Do you? Yet that transaction, like the others, if that money was accepted by Judge Archbald with a view of being influenced in any future opinion thereby, or on account of any previous decision he had rendered favorable to any of those parties in the past, puts the judge within the clear purview of the bribery statute. Can any judge afford to be guilty of conduct where his guilt or innocence of a crime depends altogether upon his mental attitude, when the facts surrounding the transaction would support a grave charge? Can any judge justify such course.

Further, the respondent in his answer says he accepted the money because it would be a reflection upon the donors to return it. What about the $125 that never reached him? Three contributions were made to Mr. Searle, the clerk, after the judge had sailed for Europe. These were not inclosed in that envelope. Mr. Searle, the clerk, wrote to him asking him whether he should send the money or keep it until he came back, and it was by the direction of the judge kept by Searle and delivered to the judge on his return from Europe.

Now, I desire to take up and consider briefly article No. 13. I desire to go a little more into detail as to this article, because the attorneys for the respondent do not seem to have ever caught the force and meaning of it. We allege in article No. 13 a general course of misconduct, a continuing course of misbehavior on the part of the judge. General misconduct is the basis of this charge. We think that if misconduct is cause for impeachment, a general course of misconduct along a particular line would be greater cause for impeachment and that those collective offenses would warrant his impeachment when the particular instances might not do so, in the judgment of the Senate.

What was the general course of Judge Archbald's conduct? He had been a judge for 28 years. If prior to 1908 he had been a just and upright judge, then all the more is the pity for his subsequent conduct. In 1908 we find him in this Rissinger transaction, already detailed by my associate managers. In December, 1909, we find that John Henry Jones executed a note to Judge Archbald. Judge Archbald indorses it, turns it over to Jones, and Jones attempts to get it cashed or discounted at the bank and fails. The note is then taken by Edward J. Williams to G. C. Boland, who was a litigant in the judge's court at the time, being a stockholder in the Marian Coal Co. He refused to cash the note. Then it was taken to W. P. Boland, another member of the firm. Mr. Boland, having a case pending in the judge's court, also refused to discount the note; and finally it is turned back to John Henry Jones, still uncashed and undiscounted. He takes it to one Von Storch, and Mr. Von Storch says he suspected the note; he did not think that a man of John Henry Jones's appearance would be carrying Judge Archbald's note around—of course that is immaterial, for the note was genuine—and in order to relieve his suspicions he called up Judge Archbald, and Judge Archbald told him that the note was all right and that it would be an accommodation to him if Von Storch would cash it. Previous to that time Von Storch was a suitor in the judge's court, in which the complainants against him claimed $10,000, and a judgment for less than $1,000 was rendered against him.

In 1910 we find Judge Archbald going abroad at the expense of a rich relative; we find him accepting this money purse of $650. But it is his conduct since he has become a judge of the Commerce Court that I am going to call your particular attention to under article No. 13. We charge in article No. 13 that, being a judge of the Commerce Court, he undertook to carry on a general coal business in dealing in culm dumps and coal properties.

The evidence in this case shows that in March, 1911, he wrote a letter to John W. Peale, who had formerly been a litigant in his court, and a successful one, in an effort to sell to Peale the Oxford washery. Failing in that, another proposition was sent, submitted by John Henry Jones. Peale does not consider it; but Jones refers him to Judge Archbald and asks Peale to call on him in the Federal building at Scranton. Then, on the 31st of March, just two months to a day from the time he had become a judge of the Commerce Court, we find him writing this letter to May asking May to give him an option on the Katydid. On the 4th of August we find him in New York to see Mr. Loomis, starting the Watson negotiations. Along in the early part of August we find him writing to his nephew, the engineer of the Girard estate, trying to secure an option on packers Nos. 3 and 4. Then, early in the spring and continuing through the summer and on into the fall up to the time of the close of the Warnke deal, we find that he is carrying on correspondence concerning the old gravity fill, which was finally sold to Warnke. In three out of these four transactions we find that Judge Archbald was interceding with the officials of the railroad companies in his efforts to bring about these sales and to secure these contracts and concessions, and in two out of the three he succeeded. The Erie yielded and agreed to sell to him and Williams the Katydid culm dump. Warriner, vice president and general manager of the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., made a concession to the judge, and agreed, so far as the railroad company was concerned, to surrender their rights and to let the Girard estate lease the property to the judge.

Now, is that conduct proper on the part of a judge? Mr. President, open bribery of public officials in this country, in my opinion, is a rare crime. Insidious influence by indirect and improper methods, I fear, is a more common one. Opportunities for making quick and easy money arise which, on the face of things, seem perfectly proper. The deluded official is lulled into a sense of his own innocence by the splendid opportunities his environments afford. Once entering into these negotiations opportunities multiply; he loses his moral perspective; he becomes money mad; finally, he is willing to go to any length to accomplish his desires. It is this particular form of evil that we are striking at in these articles of impeachment against Judge Archbald.

The testimony in this case discloses a long series of acts of misconduct on the part of the judge along certain lines, all looking to concessions, money, agreements, and commissions. By his constant dickering, trading, and trafficking with the railroad companies and with litigants in his court, and especially with those great interstate railroad companies that at the very time he was carrying on these negotiations had suits pending in the Commerce Court, of which he is a member, Judge Archbald has scandalized the high office he holds; he has soiled with coal dust the white ermine he wears; he has degraded his standing and reputation in the estimation of the American people, and has been guilty of gross improprieties which, in the judgment of the managers, warrant his impeachment.

Mr. President, I have not time to discuss the law governing impeachments in general nor to go further into the facts of the case, but I want to state briefly, in conclusion, as clearly and as concisely as I may, the position of the managers in regard to the law of this case.

It is the contention of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives that acts of misconduct need not be indictable in order to warrant impeachment. We insist that that is peculiarly so in the case of judges of United States courts. Judges hold their offices during good behavior. It is a popular fallacy that Federal judges are appointed for life. They are not. They are appointed to hold their offices during good behavior. Misbehavior is the antithesis or opposite of good behavior; and it is the contention of the managers that any form of misconduct on the part of a judge which negatives good behavior, the condition upon which he is entitled to continue in office under the Constitution, constitutes a public offense, is violative of the Constitution, and warrants his impeachment, and that it is not necessary that we should show that he violated any criminal statute in order that he may be arraigned before this high tribunal by the House of Representatives and tried for high crimes and misdemeanors under the Constitution.

It is conceded on all hands that to violate a Federal statute would be an impeachable offense. Then, upon what principle of legal construction, upon what rule of logic, reason, or common sense, can it be successfully maintained that to violate the Constitution itself or a plain requirement of the Constitution is not an impeachable offense under the law? What is a crime or misdemeanor? Any act of omission or commission for which the law has prescribed a penalty. This is elementary. Acts of misconduct on the part of judges, such as I have been describing, are acts for which the law, the Constitution itself, has prescribed a penalty. The penalty prescribed is removal from office, and the remedy in all such cases is by impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors under the Constitution.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, Mr. Manager FLOYD has occupied an hour and five minutes of the hour and nine minutes allotted to him. Mr. Manager HOWLAND will now address the Senate for 45 minutes, plus the 4 minutes not used by Mr. Manager FLOYD, if he so desires.

Mr. Manager HOWLAND addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 6 o'clock has arrived, the hour which, under the order of the Senate, concludes the sitting of the Senate in consideration of the articles of impeachment.

[Mr. Manager HOWLAND's speech is printed entire in proceedings of January 9, 1913.]

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. I understood the ruling to be that 15 hours would control rather than the mere matter of days, and that that was the interpretation this morning of the order.

Mr. President, I wish to say that under the arrangement for the apportionment of time 21 minutes remain for Mr. HOWLAND and 2 hours and 30 minutes for the concluding argument on the part of the managers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will announce that, under the order, the Senate sitting for the consideration of the articles of impeachment stands adjourned until 1 o'clock to-morrow.

After the transaction of some routine business, which appears elsewhere under the appropriate heading,

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 9, 1913, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 8, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who hast ever been our refuge and our strength, our God and our Father, continue Thy blessings unto us as individuals and as a people, that we may press forward to greater victories and greater achievements, and thus prove ourselves worthy of the mental, moral, and spiritual gifts with which Thou hast endowed us. And Thine be the praise forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RESIGNATION FROM A COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignation of Mr. FLOOD of Virginia as chairman of the Committee on the Territories:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 8, 1913.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: I herewith tender my resignation as chairman of the Committee on the Territories of the Sixty-second Congress, to take effect immediately.

Very truly, yours, H. D. FLOOD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege and ask that the Clerk will read the article in the Washington Herald of yesterday around which the blue pencil has been marked.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"There are Senators and Representatives occupying seats in Congress to-day who have allied themselves with real estate sharks in this city to fleece the Government of hundreds of thousands of dollars by seeking to sell to it large areas of land in out-of-way places for public park purposes, some of which are in ravines so deep that the Capitol could be set in them and you could not see the Indian which surmounts its dome."

This was the statement made last night by Representative FRANK CLARK of Florida in a speech at the mass meeting of the East Washington Democratic Association in Donohue's Hall, 314 Pennsylvania Avenue SE.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, if this publication referred only to me and reflected only upon me, I think I would not ask the time of this House to mention it. But it puts me in the attitude as a Member of this House of arraigning not only Members of this body, but also Members of another branch of the legislative department of this Government, and of charging them with the gravest of crimes.

I desire to state, Mr. Speaker, that not one word of truth is contained in that statement. I desire to say that not a single Washington newspaper was represented at that meeting, save the Washington Star, and the reporter of that paper gave about as accurate an account of the meeting as is usually given by reporters of newspapers.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have the highest respect for the legitimate, honest press of this country, but I have absolutely no respect for the yellow variety, of which this Washing Herald seems to be a very striking example.

What I did say, Mr. Speaker, was this, and I say it now—and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD supports every word of it—I did say that the District of Columbia has practically no government; that it has three commissioners, appointed by the President, not responsible in any sense to the people of the District. And I did say that the real estate sharks, according to my observation, after eight years of service in this city, were controlling the destinies of this city. I did say that frequently in bills there come before this House propositions to buy waste places in out-of-the-way locations for park purposes, and I instanced one case wherein I said there was a proposition by a real estate concern to unload upon the Government at a fabulous price a large tract of land having gullies in it so deep that I believed the Capitol could be planted in the bottom of the gulf and that the head of the Indian that surmounts the dome of this Capitol could not be seen above it.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOPER. Does not the gentleman think that there is another individual entitled to rise to a question of personal privilege in regard to this matter? That statue is by the gentleman from Florida called "an Indian." It is a statue of the Goddess of Liberty. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I insist that it is the figure of an Indian and not the Goddess of Liberty. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, regardless of that, I said that that proposition came to this House and that it developed upon the floor of this House—and the RECORD will show it—that a certain gentleman at that time who occupied a seat in another branch of the legislative department of this Government was a part owner in the property. I did say that when it was called to public attention that gentleman rose in his place—wherever that place is—and stated that he did not know that he had an interest in the property.

I arraigned no Members sitting in this House. I arraigned no Members sitting in the other House. I have been here eight years. I can say, Mr. Speaker, and say truthfully, that I have met during my eight years of service here no man who I do not believe is as honest as I am, as faithful in the discharge of his duties, and absolutely far from entering into any combination with the real estate sharks of this city.

Mr. Speaker, it is time, in my judgment, that the Members of this House, if they are to challenge the respect of the country, should rise in their places on all proper occasions and deny emphatically the outrageous misrepresentation of these penny-a-liners who get their information secondhand from some one else. It is simply an effort, I suppose, to sell the paper. It is simply an effort to put something sensational in it.

Mr. Speaker, I am not concealing myself. I am not asking or invoking any protection by virtue of my seat upon this floor. If the man who wrote that lie desires anything from me, I live at Congress Hall; my room is No. 153 in the House Office Building, and I walk these streets day and night as freely as any man who permanently lives here, and he can get all he wants at any time he wants it. [Applause.]

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday.

CLAIMS FOR INJURIES AND DAMAGES.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 23451) to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties, and other claims for damages to and loss of private property, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk House bill 23451, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 23451) to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties, and other claims for damages to and loss of private property.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects. The Clerk will call the first committee.

The Clerk called the Committee on the Irrigation of Arid Lands.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that there is not any unfinished business. The call rested with the Committee on the Irrigation of Arid Lands, and they had one bill last Wednesday.

Mr. MANN. They did call up one on the last day.

The SPEAKER. They are entitled to one anyway, if they have anything to do.

The Clerk again called the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

TOWN SITES IN CONNECTION WITH RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 23669) providing for the disposition of town sites in connection with reclamation projects, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House resolves itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its consideration, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] will take the chair. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 23669, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. It is a short bill and a rather important one, I think it had better be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That one-half the net proceeds heretofore received from the sale of town lots in towns within or in the vicinity of reclamation projects, sold under the provisions of the act of April 16, 1906, and June 27, 1906 (34 Stat., pp. 116, 619), and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, and one-half the net proceeds hereafter received from such sales shall be, and the same are hereby reserved, set aside, and appropriated as a special fund in the Treasury, to be known as the reclamation town-site fund, to be used in the construction, maintenance, and operation of schoolhouses, water and sewer systems, and municipal improvements in the towns where lots have been or shall be sold as aforesaid. And the aforesaid one-half of the net proceeds heretofore received from such sales shall be forthwith transferred from the reclamation fund to the reclamation town-site fund, hereby created.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, from time to time, expend, or cause to be expended, from said reclamation town-site fund, for the construction, maintenance, and operation of schoolhouses, water and sewer systems, and other municipal improvements in each of such town sites a sum not greater than one-half the net proceeds theretofore received from such sales of lots therein plus one-half the estimated net proceeds to be thereafter received from such sales. The buildings and works so constructed may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be operated and maintained by him or under his authority, and the expense thereof paid from the reclamation town-site fund, pending the organization of a municipal corporation or corporations qualified to operate and maintain the same, and upon the organization of such municipal corporation or corporations the Secretary of the Interior may transfer to such corporation or corporations the said buildings or works, or both, as the case may be, and the lands or easements necessary to their use, and thereafter said Secretary shall be free of all duty or responsibility with respect thereto: Provided, That whenever the said buildings, works, lands, easements, or any part thereof, shall cease to be used by such corporation or corporations exclusively for the purposes for which they were respectively transferred, the ownership and control thereof shall revert to the United States: And provided further, That in no case shall the operation and maintenance of such buildings and works by or under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior be continued for a longer period than five years after the construction thereof.

SEC. 3. That all income received from the operation of any such buildings or works shall be paid into and become a part of the reclamation town-site fund.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, from time to time, transfer from the reclamation town-site fund to the reclamation fund any and all moneys in excess of the amount estimated by him to be necessary for the construction, operation, and maintenance under this act of the buildings and works hereby authorized.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior is further authorized to reserve from entry such lands within or near such town sites as he may deem necessary for cemetery purposes, and to make appropriate regulations for the supervision and sale of lots in such cemetery at an appraised value, through the Reclamation Service, until such time as a municipal corporation or corporations shall be created capable of operating and maintaining such cemetery, and thereupon a legal title for the lands so reserved and then unsold shall be transferred to the municipal corporation or corporations for cemetery purposes, and the proceeds of the sales of cemetery lots by the municipal corporation or corporations shall be used for cemetery improvements. The proceeds of sales of cemetery lots by the United States shall be paid into and become a part of the reclamation town-site fund, and the cost of the improvement, maintenance, and operation of such cemeteries may be paid from said fund in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That whenever the lands or any part thereof so transferred shall be used for any other than cemetery purposes the ownership and control thereof shall revert to the United States.

SEC. 6. That the survey, subdivision, and sales of lots in the cemeteries and town sites heretofore and hereafter established under the acts aforesaid shall be conducted by the Secretary of the Interior through the Reclamation Service, and patents for the lots shall be issued in the usual manner through the General Land Office.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, there appears here a very full report from the majority of the Committee upon Arid Lands, and also a very full report from the minority consisting of two members, including the distinguished chairman of that committee, Mr. SMITH of Texas.

It will appear, Mr. Chairman, that there are about 30 of these town sites distributed according to the number of reclamation projects, and it will appear to this Committee of the Whole. I think, that it was entirely a useless performance to set aside these town sites without the Government doing something toward their settlement. In other words, it is a segregation of about 640 acres of land which is of absolutely no service to the Government or to anyone else unless the proposed relief is granted. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] is the introducer of this bill, and he is thoroughly acquainted with it, and he and other gentlemen have constituents who are more interested than I am personally in this legislation. I therefore yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] such time as he desires to occupy.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman himself is limited to one hour.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes; I know that. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] such time as he desires.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, it is not improper, I think, to state that the original bill introduced for this purpose and referred to the Committee on the Irrigation of Arid Lands was introduced at the solicitation of the Reclamation Service of the Interior Department, they believing legislation of this kind to be necessary in the operation of the national irrigation law, in connection with the town-site act passed in April, 1906.

That bill was referred by the Committee on Irrigation, under its custom, to the Interior Department for a report. The Interior Department made a report, and in connection with that report recommended that the bill, in the form in which it is now introduced, should be used as a substitute for the bill originally prepared. This bill was then reintroduced as H. R. 23039, it being at that time the latest recommendation of the department upon this subject.

The committee have made divers amendments to the bill as proposed by the Interior Department. I think I may say they are mostly minor amendments or amendments of comparatively small importance, with the exception of one, which has the effect of turning over to the municipality the administration of such municipal improvements as may be made under the provisions of this bill if it becomes a law, at an earlier date than the original bill contemplated.

I will make a brief explanation of the necessity for this legislation. The original reclamation act passed in June, 1902, made no provision whatever for the building of towns or the setting aside of town sites under national reclamation projects. The department began very soon to recommend that there should be supplemental legislation that would make it possible to set aside certain portions of the Government lands under each national project for town-site purposes. Of course, the original provisions of the reclamation act simply provided for the reclamation of arid lands, and wherever the Government had lands under these projects they were free to homesteaders.

Homesteaders could go there, and under the general homestead act could select homesteads. The Government proceeded to build the reclamation project, and ultimately the homesteader and private landowners, if there were any under these reclamation projects, could each pay his proportionate share of the cost of the construction, completion, and maintenance of these national irrigation works, and could make such payments in 10 annual installments without interest. The act of April 16, 1906, provided that authority should be vested in the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, to set aside certain particular portions of any reclamation project for town-site purposes, that he might provide a water supply for the town where it could be done, but it gave him no authority for any other provision toward municipal improvements. The bill now before the committee provides, in substance, that one-half of the proceeds of the sales of town lots under these reclamation town sites, reserved under authority of law by the Secretary, can be used, as to each particular project, for the purpose of necessary municipal improvement, like the bringing of water supply and public utilities generally, the improvement of streets, and also for the construction of schoolhouses, for the benefit of public schools, and that after a certain period when the municipality becomes organized, the charge of these public works shall be turned over by the Interior Department to the municipal corporation for its future management.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. I should like to ask the gentleman if Government funds should be applied to these municipal enterprises?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. No; and this bill does not provide for that. The proceeds of the sale of town lots do not become Government funds in any sense. Those proceeds simply pass into the general reclamation fund and are therefore a part of the fund which belongs to the trusteeship, direction, and administration of the Interior Department for the benefit of these settlers themselves.

Now, I think it will be seen at a glance that it was open to the department to adopt one of two courses in relation to the disposal of these town sites. The law provided that the lots and blocks should be appraised, and that they might be sold by the Secretary of the Interior to purchasers at not less than the appraised value. Of course, one course might have been adopted by the Reclamation Service, to wit, the selling out of the entire town site at once at the appraised value, it being taken for granted that there were purchasers who would take it. Another policy open to them was, instead of disposing of the entire town site at once, the reservation usually consisting of one section, or 640 acres, to sell but a small portion of the lots in the initial sale, and then sell other portions of the town site only as rapidly as required for actual development and improvement for the occupancy of buildings for business and living purposes. Now, wisely or otherwise, the department has adopted the latter method. I will give you a concrete illustration to make it easier to understand how the present system works.

I will take the town site of Newell, in the Bellefourche project, named after the distinguished chief or director of this service—the town site of Newell. The Secretary of the Interior set apart 640 acres of land practically in the center of that great national irrigation project, a project embracing some 100,000 acres. There are three other town sites within the project, but not Government town sites. One is the city of Bellefouche, right at the intake dam, an old town that has been there for a number of years. Another is the town of Fruitdale, and another is Nisland, all on the railroad running through this project, terminating at Newell.

These are private town sites—that is to say, they are built on property owned by private individuals or private corporations. The town site of Newell was selected in the center of the project with the idea that it was an advantageous site to render municipal conveniences to the people interested and living upon the project. While 640 acres was set aside as the town site of Newell, the Interior Department proceeded to appraise only certain specific blocks and lots embracing about 2 per cent of the 640 acres. Later the people crowded in so rapidly that the Secretary of the Interior found it necessary to set aside other blocks for sale immediately, and they were appraised and sold. Up to date there have been two sales of town lots, aggregating not to exceed 4 per cent, or about 20 acres, there being 640 acres in the entire town site, and that percentage of 20 acres is practically all occupied by business buildings and by residences.

Now, I think it will be seen at a glance that the policy adopted by the Interior Department of selling but a small portion of the town in the initial sale, reserving the rest to get the benefit of the appreciation or higher value from time to time, is, of course, very beneficial to the reclamation project in its financial aspect, because it gives the enhanced value of the future sales of lots adjoining to the reclamation fund, but it is a policy that has operated very seriously to the disadvantage of persons who have business and town lots, because it limits them to so small an area for taxation for municipal improvement.

I may say that the department at the very beginning of this matter saw that it would be unjust to take out an entire section of land a mile square—640 acres for town purposes—and sell a small acreage—15 or 20 acres—in the center of it without in some way permitting some portion of the proceeds of these lots to be used for municipal improvement. We all know that all new towns struggling with necessities of municipal improvements, public utilities, in the early history of the towns find it necessary, either by bonding or high taxation, to tax not only the business property of the town, but all property within the corporate limits, and it is rare indeed that the corporate area of towns is less than a mile square.

Take the other towns in the same project on private lands. They are able to proceed and issue bonds, which they do, on the entire real estate of the municipality, and they are able to build schoolhouses, build a city hall if they need it, improve the streets, and put in a water system and other public utilities. The department saw the necessity of these things, and perhaps without authority, certainly without strict authority, anticipated in the administration of the law already passed future action of Congress to relieve this situation. And while still holding to the concrete case of Newell, I will read from official literature, got out under the direction of the Reclamation Service and publicly distributed by the railroad company, an invitation to attract people to the town of Newell, to become purchasers at high prices of town lots. The literature contained this statement:

> The Government will conduct the sale of lots, and with the proceeds streets will be laid out, a sewage system constructed, and every possible measure taken to improve and beautify the city.

Now, it goes without argument that people who came to that sale from various States of the Union, as they did, with the Reclamation Service of the Government behind a statement of that kind, would bid much more liberally, much higher prices, for lots under the assurance that the proceeds were to be used for the construction of these municipal utilities. And yet, unless a very liberal interpretation be given to the authority of the Secretary of the Interior under the act directing him to withdraw town sites, there was probably no authority for a statement of that kind.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from South Dakota yield?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I understand that that was a statement made in reference to the sale of town lots in Newell?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. In Newell.

Mr. MANN. With that statement in the hands of the intending purchaser, how much did the lots sell for?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Less than 4 per cent—it would be in the neighborhood of 20 acres—brought over $41,000, or over $2,000 an acre, including the residence and business property.

I know personally of people who came from Indiana—a man sold out his business, his attention attracted to this great irrigation project with its potential future, with this announcement in his hand, became a purchaser and got a business lot, for which he paid two or three thousand dollars, and has constructed a good, permanent building on it. He invested his entire estate—$15,000—and is there to-day relying upon these representations.

Now, I think the course the department has taken, barring the mere question as to whether that assurance is not in excess of strict legal authority under the act of 1906—I say, barring that query, I think the course that the department has taken a wise course from the standpoint of getting ultimately a large sum into the reclamation fund from the value of the town sites, because it gives to this fund the increased appreciation of value that always comes from a growing town.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from South Dakota yield?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. How much of the $41,000 has been used for municipal improvements?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. None whatever.

Mr. MANN. That feature of it has not been carried out.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. It has not been carried out. The department very early concluded they required further legislation in order to be able to carry out this policy.

Mr. MANN. Did they conclude that after they had issued the regulation?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. After they had issued the regulation.

Mr. MANN. And sold the land?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If it were a private concern it would be hauled up by the Post Office Department for conducting a fraudulent enterprise.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I may say—and the gentleman from Illinois will see how forcible is the object lesson in South Dakota—that we have now one of the prominent citizens of South Dakota under judgment and sentenced to a term of years in the penitentiary, under prosecution of the Department of Justice, upon the charge of selling lots in an addition to the town site of Pierre, the capital, under literature which showed a trolley line extending out over his property, when in fact a trolley line was never constructed. If this sort of a proposition could inadvertently be announced and carried through, it would be a fraud upon those people that the Government would be certainly under moral obligations to correct.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman again yield?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman read, as I understood, from a circular issued by the railroad company, purporting to give a regulation of the department. Was such a regulation in fact promulgated by the department?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman is—and very properly so, if it is desired—asking that we go into this piece of past history further than it was my purpose, but no further than it is proper to go into it, and I will give the gentleman the entire facts about that. Naturally it has attracted my attention, and I have endeavored to get at all of the facts. The gentleman from Illinois is, I think, under a misapprehension as to how this has been issued and circulated.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have no knowledge about it except what the gentleman himself gave us.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I think the gentleman from Illinois misunderstood me.

Mr. MANN. That may be.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. On this circular, on the outside of it, there is the following:

Bellefourche Irrigation Project of South Dakota. Information compiled by the United States Reclamation Service, October 1, 1909.

It all bears the stamp of the Reclamation Service, and nothing else. As a matter of fact, I understand this was the manner in which it was published. A field representative of the Reclamation Service prepared the document. One or more railroad companies paid the expense of its circulation. The department here has not been satisfied with the part and responsibility that is naturally thrown upon the service for that sort of a transaction, but the facts are that it was prepared by a field agent of the Reclamation Service, and either at the time or very shortly thereafter, with the knowledge of the heads of the service, was circulated without anything on it at all to indicate that it was circulated by anyone other than the Reclamation Service; and I may say, as a matter of fact, hundreds of them were circulated by the service itself.

Mr. MANN. What I was seeking to ascertain was whether the Reclamation Service itself had ever issued any such regulation.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The Reclamation Service itself——

Mr. MANN. I am not speaking about some officer who does something without authority.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Oh, it was not without authority. I do not contend, nor do I concede, that it was without authority. It was done in the course of advertising of the Reclamation Service. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. MANN. Did the Reclamation Service in Washington authorize a promise to be made that a portion of this fund should be used for local improvements? That is what I am trying to get at, as a matter of good faith upon the part of the Government.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman can draw his own conclusion.

Mr. MANN. It is not a matter of conclusion. It is a question of fact.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. It is a question of fact to be deduced from all of the evidence in the case.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. A field officer in the Reclamation Service is not authorized to prepare or issue literature without authority from headquarters. Did the officer have such authority?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I will give the gentleman my best judgment about that. I have no doubt, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois and to the committee, that this information was prepared with the full knowledge and at least the implied authority of the Reclamation Service in its proper head and authorization. Whether the office in Washington actually saw this literature and all details of it before it was published, I am not at this moment able to state, but that they had cognizance that such literature was being prepared and that it was permitted to be prepared by a person in their employ whom they considered capable of preparing it I have no doubt, and that, if not before, very soon after, its circulation began. I have not the slightest doubt but that copies of it were very familiar to the department in Washington as well as elsewhere.

The only information upon this document as to under what authority it was issued, aside from what I read on the first page, appears on the last page of the pamphlet, the cover, and is as follows:

Further information may be obtained by addressing any of the following:
Project engineer, United States Reclamation Service, Bellefourche, S. Dak.
The statistician, United States Reclamation Service, Washington, D. C.
Information bureau, United States Reclamation Service, 777 Federal Building (post office), Chicago, Ill.

I think it is perfectly evident that the information was circulated with the knowledge of the department, and certainly under implied and probably actual authority.

Mr. MANN. What I was seeking to ascertain was whether the Reclamation Service itself supposed it had the authority to divert a portion of the purchase price of these lots for municipal improvements at the time this town site was sold?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. My opinion is that the service probably considered they had authority to do so at the time this literature was gotten out.

Mr. MANN. I take it the Reclamation Service knows whether it thought it had authority. The gentleman has been in touch with this service and certainly must know whether the chief supposed under existing law he had authority to make such a promise and to keep it.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I first had my attention called to this matter after the sales had taken place. At that time and before I had any counsel with the heads of the department here about it the department had reached the conclusion that they did not have the authority. My opinion is that when this was issued they probably thought the act of 1906 was general enough to give that authority. After these sales had been concluded, whatever their mind had been before, they at once took steps to try to get direct authorization of Congress. Senator BORAH introduced a bill in the Senate to that effect at the request of the department a number of years ago, and I introduced a bill within the last three years on the same general subject.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman has very complete information on this subject, and I would like to inquire of him if he knows of any other town sites that have been advertised in this way by the Reclamation Service.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I am not able to state. There will be other gentlemen from Western States in which these town sites are situated who will be heard upon this bill, and they can state. I have not inquired.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. You have no knowledge of it?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Except as to this specific one, and I think I ought in fairness to say that so far as the head of this service is concerned, I know that at the time I first called attention to the matter in the office here in Washington he not only very much regretted that that statement had been made under the circumstances, but was disposed to criticize it. I am really not in position to state what actual knowledge he had at the time of the circulation of the literature. That the department had knowledge that the literature was published and that they intrusted one of the employees of the department to prepare it I have no doubt. Now I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH], the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The gentleman will remember that the head of the Reclamation Service was before the committee on this very question, and I do not believe the gentleman can state to this House that Mr. Newell, the chief of that service, ever admitted that he was responsible for that circular or that he ever believed that he had authority to construct municipal improvements upon any of these town sites.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Did the Chief of the Reclamation Service testify whether circulars had been issued as to other town sites in this same way?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I want the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] to first answer the question I put to him.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I do not think Mr. Newell in his testimony made any statement that would be an admission that he had considered that he had authority to make any such statement. I do not think——

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I do not think Mr. Newell has ever contended that the Reclamation Service had that power, and I do not think he has ever attempted to exercise it. Is not that true?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman can see as well as I whether it is an exercise of the power or not.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Now, there is another question I want to put to the gentleman. As I understand it, the gentleman contends that certain parties have been misled by certain advertisements that have been issued throughout the West, and the gentleman does not state who circulated those advertisements.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I have stated that this literature was printed and paid for by the railroad and circulated by them and by agents of the Reclamation Service jointly.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. It is immaterial on the question that I am going to put to the gentleman now. Admitting for the sake of argument that some persons may have been misled by these advertisements, does the gentleman think that is any justification for establishing a general policy applying to all reclamation projects now existing or that may be constructed in the future if that policy is unwise?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I think it is elemental that persons have been deceived by certain announcements that the obligations of the Government would be satisfied in meeting their specific case. On the other hand, I think the policy indicated by this bill, to apply to all reclamation projects, is a wise policy and will operate for the benefit of the reclamation fund probably as well as any other plan that could be devised. Of course, the merits of the bill itself must justify the legislation when it is sought to be applied to a present and future policy for all these town sites.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is the situation.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. I see in the report here that this particular town site of Newell has a tract of 640 acres. Will you please inform the committee from what source the Reclamation Service was authorized to select the 640-acre tract?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The original town-site act of 1906 authorized the selection of 160 acres. I asked my learned friend, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], a few moments ago under what authority larger town sites than 160 acres have been selected by the Reclamation Service. He is of the opinion that there was subsequent legislation enlarging the area. If so, I would ask him to give us the citation. I was not familiar with that fact.

Mr. MONDELL. The act of June 27, 1906, Statutes at Large, volume 34——

Mr. RAKER. I have that act here.

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). Provides, in section 4, that after making certain provisions for the town sites of Heyburn and Rupert, whenever in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior it shall be advisable for the public interest he may withdraw and dispose of town sites in excess of 160 acres under the provisions of the aforesaid act, approved April 16, 1906. There is no limitation, as the gentleman will see.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that I have made it entirely clear, or that I would be able, if I took more time, to make it entirely clear, as to how much of the responsibility of the Reclamation Service for the issuance of this particular prospectus came within the actual knowledge of the actual head of that service until after it was in print, and how much the head of the service is to be charged with simple reliance upon the acts of others in his employ in the service. I think, perhaps, it is right to say that he would probably disclaim any actual knowledge of the precise language in that statement until after it had been, at least, circulated for a period. But so far as the responsibility of the service is concerned, for the literature, I have no doubt.

Mr. ESCH. I notice on the last page of the pamphlet is inserted a map, which appears to be a railroad map, showing the Chicago & North Western Railway system. Would not that be notice to any reader that this pamphlet was gotten out and circulated by this railroad system? Would anyone be deceived as to the source of the information contained in the pamphlet?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I do not think so at all. This does not bear the stamp of a railroad map. It is a general map of that section of the country. It has no suggestion of an advertisement of the railroad upon it anywhere, either upon its face or upon its back. It sets forth certain railway lines—the Chicago & North Western, the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, and others—the designations of the tracks of the Chicago & Northern being in heavier and blacker lines than the others. But there is nothing to indicate to me, although perhaps there might be to others, that that was circulated by a railroad company instead of by the Reclamation Service.

And, of course, it is true that these sales were not made by the railroad company. The railroad company had nothing to do with these sales. They were not interested in them. All sales of the town lots were made by the Reclamation Service, and the proceeds have gone into the reclamation fund.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Yes; certainly.

Mr. RAKER. In response to the question that I asked a moment ago, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] read that part of section 4 of the act approved June 27, 1906. I find it is specially provided in that act that the Secretary of the Interior is not authorized to withdraw more than 160 acres of land unless it is in the public interest. Now, I understand the gentleman's contention in this matter is that you have 640 acres of land and you can not improve it.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. RAKER. I say, how can you reconcile the fact now that you have 640 acres of land? Your contention now is that you can not improve it, and this reserve was made on 640 acres with the idea evidently that the first 160 acres were to be used as town sites, and more was needed.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The entire reservation of 640 acres was made at first. There has been no second reservation. A mile square at the beginning was set aside for general town-site purposes. There has been no change in the boundaries set apart for town purposes. There has been no change in the boundaries of the town sites at all.

Mr. RAKER. So that the committee may have the matter fully before it, may I ask the gentleman this question——

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Certainly——

Mr. RAKER. Whether or not any part of this 640 acres was platted into a town?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I do not think the gentleman was in the Chamber when I discussed that subject.

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I was in.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I stated that at the beginning somewhere near 10 acres were set out in lots and blocks. Shortly afterwards, that not being sufficient for the actual occupancy of the people for business and residential purposes another area of about the same amount was set aside immediately adjoining and sold, so that now in the neighborhood of 20 acres out of the 640, it being situated in the geographical center of the entire town site, have been disposed of.

Mr. RAKER. There was not any arrangement made for the laying out of any considerable town there at all, so far as a planning of the various streets and squares and public reserves was concerned, was there?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I am not able to say whether the streets and public reserves were cut out of the entire 640 acres or not. I can only say that only about 20 acres have been subdivided into lots and disposed of.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to ask just another question, and then I will be through. Have there been many applications for town lots that have been surveyed, and is it a fact that the department has made no effort to lay off the land and offer the lots for sale?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. As to this particular town, I think the department has responded to all requests that have been made for the sale of lots. After the first sale it was evident that the first sale was not sufficient for the actual needs of the town, and there was a great clamor for the sale of more lots, which was met by the second sale, to which I have referred. I do not think that there has been any special demand, so far as I know, for the sale as yet of other lots.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with the indulgence of the committee I would like to consider briefly the merits of the general proposition. I have already stated that if the department had adopted the other plan of selling the entire town sites at once these complications could not have arisen. In what they have conceived to be the interest of the fund, by reason of getting the benefit of increased prices on lots to be sold in the future, they have adopted this particular plan.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Not now. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the necessity of this legislation in order to make it possible to maintain the town sites at all, so far as public improvements and public utilities are concerned. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he did not believe it wise policy to pass an act, if necessary, allowing all these town sites to be put on the market and sold to the public rather than inaugurate this policy of constructing municipal improvements in a new town free of charge and turning them over to the people ready-made?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Well, as a policy adopted at the beginning, I should have no choice between the two, but would perhaps lean to the suggestion of the gentleman, to sell it all at once. But I have no doubt that the policy adopted by the service is the one that will bring the most money to the reclamation fund, and in that way probably prove more beneficial from the public standpoint.

I think gentlemen will see that under the policy adopted the situation of occupants of these Government town sites—taking just simply the concrete example that I have given as a fair illustration of others—is intolerable. They have paid a large price for lots. They put the rest of their money in improvements, and they have absolutely no power of taxation beyond the improved area. And I may say, as a practical proposition, until they get their deeds, which are to be made out when the lots are entirely paid for, the matter of taxation would be even more circumscribed than that, and it would be confined to the taxation of personalty and of an equitable interest to ripen into a title in the future to the lots that they have contracts for the purchase of.

I think that the provisions of the bill would work very equitably as between the public and the particular occupants of town sites. This bill provides that one half of this fund simply can go into these municipal improvements; the other half goes into the reclamation fund, which gives the benefit of it to the settlers all about the town.

There is a community of interest between the settlers, who are cultivating the fields, and the occupants of the towns. Their interests are one. The policy of this bill is to give the settler in his combined capacity one half the proceeds of the lots, and that the other half shall be used for the betterment of the town itself.

Mr. WILLIS. Is it the provision of this bill that the money shall be put into the general municipal funds and distributed and used by the municipalities, or is the Secretary of the Interior to make these improvements and operate the lighting system, schools, and so forth?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The money goes, in the first instance, into the reclamation town-site fund, which is kept specific and separate from the general reclamation fund. The Secretary of the Interior has authority to proceed to make certain improvements and to operate them until the municipality is incorporated. The bill, as amended, would require the Secretary in not to exceed two years from the date of the incorporation of the town to turn over the whole project from that time on to the municipality itself.

Mr. WILLIS. Is there anything, then, to limit the time during which the Secretary of the Interior may continue to operate these improvements? Is there any time within which this incorporation shall take place? Might not the community, being satisfied with having its lighting system, its schools, and so forth, carried on and paid for by the Interior Department, be unwilling to incorporate? Might they not simply live on and let that condition continue indefinitely?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I would commend the gentleman to a rather close study of the bill upon this subject. I do not think it could work in that way. If so, it ought to be further amended. As a matter of fact, in the building of town sites in the West one of the first things is to incorporate. It is the habit and custom of the West, as you will find in almost every hamlet, to incorporate and have its town officers. This particular town to which I refer is a concrete illustration. It was incorporated long ago.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman will yield further, I was referring to the second section, in line 24. It says there:

> The buildings and works so constructed may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be operated and maintained by him or under his authority, and the expense thereof paid from the reclamation town-site fund, pending the organization of a municipal corporation.

Now, down in the latter part of the section, is the only language that pretends to limit it, that I can find. This provision is found in line 17, page 3, where it says:

> That in no case shall the operation and maintenance of such buildings and works by or under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior be continued for a longer period than two years after the organization of a municipal corporation or school district as aforesaid.

There is nothing to require incorporation. If they should simply continue to live as an unorganized hamlet, these expenses would have to be paid by the Secretary of the Interior indefinitely, it seems to me.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I think the gentleman has overlooked the fact that the fund will be turned over to the municipality upon the sale of future lots, after the organization of the municipality, just as completely as though the Secretary should manage it.

Mr. WILLIS. That is not the point. In the case which I am supposing there is no municipality. That is the very point I am getting at, that they may continue to live on indefinitely without any municipal organization, without any incorporation, and the Secretary of the Interior, under the provisions of this bill, will be required to keep up their schools and lighting system, sewerage system, and so forth.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Yes; but the Secretary of the Interior is doing that out of this very fund which he is administering for them; and certainly the community itself would rather manage its own affairs out of its own fund than to allow the Secretary of the Interior indefinitely to manage its affairs out of the same fund. In other words, there is no temptation to the municipality to allow the Secretary to continue indefinitely, or for a longer time than the shortest possible limitation, to administer this fund, when they have the same fund themselves to administer in their own way under the provisions of the act as soon as they get hold of it.

Mr. WILLIS. I have not framed any amendment yet, but it seems to me there ought to be an amendment framed that would specifically limit the period during which the Secretary of the Interior could do this. That would obviate the objection I have been suggesting. Would the gentleman have any objection to such an amendment?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I would not object, and I may say that so far as my personal views are concerned I would have been as well satisfied with the legislation if it had provided at the very start that one-half the proceeds should be turned over to the municipality for these purposes as soon as the municipality was organized. But the Department of the Interior consider that as they are there first on the ground, laying out irrigation districts, they are in a better position to bring in the water, and that perhaps their force can make streets more cheaply than the municipality could. The Department have considered it important that in the first year or two of the building of these new towns they should have a hand in it. Personally I should be entirely satisfied if the legislation should pass the Congress in a form that would turn the money over to the municipality in the beginning, as soon as it was properly organized to receive it. I think there are no serious objections to the system as devised in the bill itself. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has answered the question which I desired to ask him.

Mr. KENT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. KENT. I should like to ask the gentleman whether this town-site reclamation fund is a specific fund for each town or whether it is general?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Each town is to have the benefit of its own specific fund under this bill.

Now, this legislation is really necessary. I can see no possible serious objection to it. If the funds involved were Government funds, the Congress might with propriety be very conservative about entering into this sort of a proposition; but the funds are simply those of the people themselves who are most intimately interested. It will tend to cultivate local pride, in the knowledge that each town is to have the benefit of the fund that comes from the sale of its own lots to the extent of one-half of the proceeds. From the standpoint of public policy I can see no serious objection to it.

As to the necessity of the legislation, it is absolutely vital to the maintenance of these towns. Congress must do one of two things—either pass this act or it must direct the distribution to private ownership of all of the surplus lands of the town site, with a provision for doing equity to the town-lot purchasers, who have risked their all in reliance upon the Government town-site representations thus far, or these towns will have to be abandoned, for they can not make the municipal improvements under the conditions that now exist.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I will.

Mr. RAKER. Could that be brought about immediately if the land was all surveyed and put up at public auction?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. So far as the future is concerned, it would, provided it was all sold, but it might not be all sold.

Mr. RAKER. There has been no attempt yet to sell it. My recollection from the hearings is that the department refused to survey or offer the remaining tracts for sale.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The department is endeavoring to put the property on the market as fast as it is needed for actual improvement, and to leave the element of speculation on the future for the benefit of the cestuis que trust instead of town-site speculators.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that in this town of Newell the very provision of the statute directing the Secretary to select school lots and courthouse lots and lots for public parks has not been complied with?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. No; I think not. I think they have made reservations for these purposes, but that is simply a site to build a schoolhouse or a city hall upon. It takes money to build city halls and schoolhouses and parks and other municipal improvements.

I want to impress this on the committee, that after purchasing simply 4 per cent of a town site, spending money in the improvement of it, it is absolutely impossible to proceed and build municipal improvements, bring in water supplies to protect against fire, improve the streets, with the Government owning 96 per cent of the town site free from taxation. If we could suspend the sovereignty of the Government in these cases and tax the property which the Government is holding as a trustee for the settlers, the 96 per cent of the town site would be subject to taxation and the situation could be met, but that is impossible.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 109) to authorize the sale and disposition of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Standing Rock Indian Reservation, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CLAPP, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. ASHURST as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

TOWN SITES IN CONNECTION WITH RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I very much regret that I have felt the necessity of disagreeing with my brethren on the committee of which I have the honor to be the chairman in regard to the wisdom of the passage of this bill. I am so thoroughly convinced myself, after a thorough examination of the matter and a very careful and earnest consideration of it, that the policy which it proposes to establish is unwise and will result in evil to the people of this country I have felt constrained to come before the House and state my objections to it. When I have done so and when this House thoroughly understands just what is proposed by this measure I am convinced that Members will not vote for its passage.

Now, let us understand just what is proposed: Some years ago after the inauguration of the general reclamation policy by Congress a bill was passed providing that the Secretary of the Interior should have the right to reserve lands within the reclamation project for the purpose of a town site for the convenience of the water users under reclamation projects.

It provided that the reservation so made should be surveyed and divided into lots and parks, that these lots should be appraised and sold by the Secretary of the Interior. It further provided that the parks so reserved might be improved by the authorities of the municipality.

Now, that was as far as Congress thought proper to go at that time in regard to these town matters, and I believe that that was as far as it was wise to go. The proposition here in this measure is that one-half of the proceeds arising from the sale of these town lots shall be covered into a special fund to be known as town-site reclamation fund, and that that fund may be used for the construction, maintenance, operation of schoolhouses, water, light, and sewer systems, and other school and municipal improvements.

The purposes for which this fund may be used as provided in this bill are absolutely unrestricted. It may be used for any public improvement within the town site that the Secretary may choose to make. It fails to provide, Mr. Chairman, that the inhabitants of these town sites shall share any part of the expense for these improvements, but the fund so raised from the sale of these town lots in the Treasury of the United States Government shall be given as gratuities to the municipalities.

I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the further fact that these improvements may be made by the Secretary of the Interior without regard to the population, without regard to the business, and without regard to the wealth of the town, as soon as the lots are sold, as soon as the fund is created by the sale of the lots. Before there is an inhabitant there, before there is any necessity for the town at all, the Secretary of the Interior can go there and construct schoolhouses, and construct waterworks, and construct electric-light systems, and, if necessary, can construct electric railways and build courthouses and everything to make up a ready-made municipal corporation and turn it over to a few inhabitants who may come to the place thereafter.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is aware that all of these splendid improvements to which he refers could not be made unless some one has purchased the town lots?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. That is true.

Mr. MONDELL. And paid for them?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. That is true.

Mr. MONDELL. He can only make such improvements as can be made with one-half of the money that has been paid for the lots?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. That is absolutely true.

Mr. MONDELL. Then does the gentleman think that he could build improvements vastly beyond, or that he would build improvements vastly beyond the needs of the town, when he is limited in his expenditures to 50 per cent of the cash on hand received from the sale of the lots?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. That is true, but the only limitation put upon the power of the Secretary of the Interior is that very limitation, viz, the amount of the funds that he has on hand from the sale of the lots; but he does not have to wait for the building up of the town and for the establishment of business except for the purpose of getting funds.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman think it would be at all likely that 50 per cent of the cash paid for town lots sold on time, as these are, or on deferred payment—does he think that 50 per cent of the sum so received would build improvements in excess of the necessities of the community?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. It may be that speculators would buy the lots and hold them for the Government to expend the money and enhance the value of the property.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman think that speculators would buy the lots in order that the Government might spend 50 per cent of the money?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in this bill limiting the power of the Secretary of the Interior in that respect. It seems to me that these town-site propositions ought to be put upon the same footing that other town-site propositions throughout the country are put upon, and that is that they shall not have the power or the ability to provide these municipal improvements until the population, the business, and the wealth of the town justify it.

Section 2 of the bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to maintain all the improvements made by him on these town sites until the municipality organizes, and for two years thereafter—all at the expense of the town-site fund.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas a question.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi). Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I do.

Mr. CULLOP. Under that provision would it not be possible that these could be continued under Federal supervision for an indefinite period of time, and would it not be to the interest of the people living in that locality to have the Government administer it?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The gentleman is absolutely correct in the suggestion which he makes. There is absolutely no provision in this bill requiring when these towns should be organized. It only provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall not operate these works longer than two years after their organization.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Supposing all the lots were sold, and that one-half of the proceeds had gone into these municipal improvements, and the town be not organized, under this law would not the Government of the United States be compelled to maintain indefinitely the public improvements of this town?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. It would.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Just one moment. And I want to say, further, that the probabilities are that these towns would never organize for the very reason stated a while ago—that the business and the population and the wealth of the town would never justify their operation.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman support the bill if an amendment, offered by himself, to limit, as he sees fit, the time when the Secretary shall maintain these improvements be placed in the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. No; I will not.

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly not; because the gentleman is opposed to the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I am against the bill not only for that reason, but I am against the policy that you are trying to inaugurate.

Mr. MONDELL. In other words, the gentleman is against the bill even if all of the alleged objections that he makes were met.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I am against the bill on account of the objections which I have stated and which anybody can see by reading the bill.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the language at the end of section 2 on page 3:

> That in no case shall the operation and maintenance of such buildings and works by or under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior be continued for a longer period than two years after the organization of a municipal corporation or school district as aforesaid.

Under that language there could be an indefinite delay in the organization of a municipal corporation, could there not?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Certainly; and I believe there would be, because in many cases the population, wealth, and business of the town would not justify the organization and the taking over of the improvements that might be made.

Mr. CULLOP. Would it not be to the interest of those people personally for them not to organize?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. That is what I am saying.

Mr. CULLOP. It would relieve them from the burden of supporting their local government, which they would otherwise have.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Would it meet the objection of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] if the words "construction thereof," in line 20, which have been stricken out, were left in the bill, so that it would read:

> For a longer period than two years after the construction thereof, and in no case after the organization of a municipal corporation.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, the objection to that would be that still there is no provision requiring organization. There ought to be, in my judgment, a specified time in which the organization of the corporation should be perfected, and immediately, or at the earliest possible date, divorce the management and control of it from the Federal Government and place it under local government. I do not believe that it is a good policy for the Federal Government at Washington to be administering the affairs of a people 1,000 or 2,000 miles away in their local government. Such a policy is a blow at local self-government.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further at this point.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Not at this time. I want to say further, in connection with what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] has just stated, that even if there were a limit fixed when these town sites should be organized into a municipal corporation, and the Government should cease to operate them, yet here is a proposition to construct municipal improvements for a town that has not reached the point of organization—a thing that has never before been heard of in this country, I believe; and if a time were fixed when they were to be turned over, it might be at a time when they could not be supported and maintained by the town, because of the fact that the town had not reached that state of development of business, of population, and wealth that would enable it to operate and maintain these public improvements; and in that case, Mr. Chairman, there would be nobody to take charge of and preserve the property and it would result in a loss to the Government and to the public.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman support the bill if it is amended so that no expenditures shall be made except in incorporated towns?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I decline to be interrupted by any question that does not develop the facts of this matter, asking what I would or would not do.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is opposed to the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I have stated that frankly. I am opposed to the policy of the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Without regard to the objections he makes, will the gentleman support the bill if a provision is made that no money shall ever be expended except in an incorporated town?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I decline to be interrupted by the gentleman, who continues to put a question of that sort, that sheds no light on the question we are discussing, as to what I would or would not do if the bill were in a different form.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this sort of legislation upon general grounds. It is a species of favoritism. In the other States, in my State and in your State, outside of these reclamation projects, every new town has to make its own way.

Every new town is built up by the business that is contributory to it, the support that it gets from the country, and it does not undertake to construct and operate these various municipal improvements until the business back of it builds up and develops it to the point where it can itself construct and maintain these public improvements. That is so in my State, and that is so in every other State in this Union, and I see no reason why we should now take up these reclamation town sites and vote money out of the Public Treasury to build them up, construct municipal improvements free of charge to them, in advance of the business and the development of the country that is necessary for their support and maintenance.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman wants to be entirely accurate. Of course, he realizes he is not accurate when he refers to taking money out of the Public Treasury for this purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I am entirely accurate when I say this is a proposition to take money out of the Public Treasury.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman says that?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I say that, and it is a fact. The fact that this may be called a "special reclamation town-site fund," Mr. Chairman, is perfectly consistent with the fact that, nevertheless, it comes from the Public Treasury of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I will.

Mr. MANN. Take the case that was cited by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] as to the town of Newell, where 640 acres were set aside for a town site, and 25 acres were sold for over $40,000, under this bill and ascertaining the amount that might be expended for public improvements in that town, what would be the basis—$41,000 for which the property was sold, or the $41,000 plus the estimated value of the remainder of the 640 acres?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I believe, under this bill, though I am not absolutely sure about that, it would be confined to the actual proceeds arising from the sales.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The balance of the proceeds could be had as fast as the land was sold?

Mr. MANN. That is under the bill as amended or under the bill as introduced?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Under the bill as it is before the House. The proceeds of the sale arising from the balance of it could be used under this bill.

Mr. MANN. Under the bill as pending here, the bill has a large number of amendments, and it really is desirable to know just what the situation is——

Mr. SMITH of Texas. As I understand, one of the objections of the Secretary of the Interior to the present bill is that it does not provide for taking into consideration the appraised value of the unsold lots in fixing the amount of money to be put in any particular place.

Mr. MANN. I understood the recommendation of the department was that they must have the authority to take the estimated value of the unsold property.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. That was the recommendation.

Mr. MANN. For the 50 per cent which may be expended on local improvements?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That is the bill as it is pending here.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I do not think so. I think that is one of the objections the department makes to the bill.

Mr. MANN. The department may make an objection to an amendment proposed by the committee. Of course, that amendment has not been agreed to yet.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have another objection to the passage of this bill and the policy which it proposes to establish, and that is that it is a departure from the purposes of the reclamation act. The purpose of the reclamation act was to reclaim arid lands for the purpose of agriculture, for making homes for farmers, and I believe that the future success and popularity of that policy depends upon Congress restricting it to the purpose for which it was inaugurated.

Here is a proposition to lay aside the idea of reclamation. It is a proposition to build up towns, to make ready-made and up-to-date towns out of the reclamation funds and turn them over, free of charge, to people who may be fortunate enough to get lots within the town sites. And why? What reason is there for the Reclamation Service to depart from the policy which has been set and go into the business of building up cities in this country? Oh, but they say it is for the benefit of the water users under these reclamation projects. In reply to that I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that towns in this country go behind—they follow. They do not advance ahead of the settlement of the country. Towns are built up from necessity, built up because they are needed by the agricultural and manufacturing industries that surround them, and whenever suitable conditions of development come about in one of these reclamation projects the town will follow as a matter of course, and towns will develop to the extent that the business of the community justifies. But here they propose to get the cart before the horse, to build the town for the community, and let the country build up after the town is built. And I see no reason why the Government of the United States should go into the business of building towns to be turned over ready-made to any class of citizens in this country. That is the reason, I want to say to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], why I will not be in favor of this bill after he has inserted in it the amendments which he suggests.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I will.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Did I understand that the gentleman is opposed to these town sites entire?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. No, sir. I am in favor of having reservations made for town sites and have them subdivided into lots and sold as necessities may require.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. That is what they claim they are doing.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I am not in favor of building a ready-made town to turn over to anybody in this country.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. How would the gentleman meet this question of the ability of purchasers of town lots in these Government projects to erect these municipal improvements?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Whenever the business of the community develops sufficiently it will take care of itself.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. That has to be done by taxes, does it not?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. It has to be done by taxation when they have developed sufficiently to have the amount of taxes to meet their needs.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. They can not wait long for a water supply of a town, can they?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The gentleman well knows that all over this country there are small towns, county seats in my State and his, that are providing their own water supply.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I will.

Mr. MANN. On a matter of water, it would be profitable to the Government. I have had a little experience in laying out city subdivisions, as an attorney and otherwise. I take it that it rarely happens now that a man lays out a subdivision of city lots and offers it for sale without first putting in certain improvements.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Yes; speculators do that.

Mr. MANN. Yes; speculators do it; certainly. But they sell the lots to people to build houses on them. That is the way cities are built up, whether it is done by speculators or not. A man would not go and lay out a subdivision on the prairie with no street improvements in and no sidewalks in and no anything in and sell it, because he thinks it is more profitable to sell the lots with these improvements in. Now, if that is true with the city speculator, as the gentleman calls him, why is it not equally true with the Government when it is doing the same thing?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The gentleman well knows that the work of laying out additions and new towns that he speaks of is done by speculators—men who are trying to build up towns to make money out of them. I do not think the Government ought to try to undertake to make money out of these town sites. Let the Government sell them for what they are worth, and let the people build the towns. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that the Government of the United States ought to go into the business of town-lot speculation; and if we do, and the day ever comes when the Government of the United States does embark upon a policy of that sort, then you may look for more scandals in the business of this Government than you have ever seen before.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman calls it "speculation." Has it not been the practice and is it not the law, where the Government is opening up reservations in various places, that it can withdraw land for town-site purposes, and does offer that land in the shape of lots?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I think that is all right. We have done that in regard to reclamation projects.

Mr. MANN. With the expectation that the lots will sell for higher prices than the ordinary land does; and if the Government does that at all, is it not desirable that it do it in the proper way?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I think not. The Government is doing that to the extent that is proposed here. I do not think that the Government ought to do it. When the Government lays off the lots and sells them, then the agency of the Government ought to cease.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Yes.

Mr. KOPP. The gentleman says the lands should be sold for what they are worth.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The law provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall appraise them.

Mr. KOPP. But in determining their worth, would not the municipal improvements be a very important element?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. They would be appraised before there is any improvement.

Mr. KOPP. They would be sold after the improvements, would they not?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Some of them may be. Personally I am in favor of the Government selling the whole thing and not trying to speculate at all. I think that that would be better for everybody concerned. I do not believe that if you go all over this country and examine into the men who speculate in these things you will find as many who have made successes as those who have made failures. Here you propose to clothe one man in the Government—the Secretary of the Interior, who sits up here in his office in the city of Washington, his time occupied by hundreds of other things and operating through agents and subordinates throughout the country—with the authority to go into the town site and town lot speculation business, and there is no necessity for it. There is no object to be obtained by it, so far as I can see, except to build a town and equip it with municipal improvements free of charge, and turn it over to the people who happen to live there.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Following the line of the questions asked by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and referring also to what the gentleman has said with reference to speculators, is it not true as a matter of fact that this fund does not go to the Government? Directly it does, it is true, but indirectly does it not go to the settlers under these reclamation projects?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. No; it goes into the Public Treasury and may be used for reclamation work. The farmers are required to pay that money back into the Treasury. In one sense it comes out of the reclamation fund and not out of the Treasury of the United States, but practically it comes out of the Treasury.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. But it comes from a separate fund used for reclamation. Now, let me ask the gentleman this further question: That being true, the greater the population you have in a town or city the more increased will be the value of the other lots to be sold. Is not that true?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. That is true, and that is the speculative feature of it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Just one moment more. Is not that speculative feature running to the individual rather than to the Government? The gentleman has said nothing about settlers under these projects. They get the benefit of this fund as fast as the lots are sold. They have to pay just that much less money.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The amount of improvements under the terms of this bill goes as a free gift to the people of that town. It does not go back to the Treasury of the United States. It is a speculation on the part of the Government, because, according to the contention of the gentleman, this money is expended for these municipal improvements with the expectation and hope that it will increase the value of the unsold lots and it will make the money back. It is nothing more nor less than a town-lot speculation.

Now, the gentleman talks about these towns being handicapped. He says that they can not tax the lots that still remain in the hands of the Government. For that reason I say that the lots ought to be sold. If they are sold it would be more equitable to authorize these municipalities to tax these unsold lots. Then the property owners of the town would be required to bear the proportionate cost and expense of these municipal improvements. The proposition which they make here is far from merely trying to adjust the equitable conditions that exist there. They propose that the Government shall bear the whole expense as a free gift to them. It is not a proposition to equalize and adjust the equity that may exist between the Government and the inhabitants of the town.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one other thing. A good deal has been said here about it. There was a little noise in the House at the time, and I do not know that I got it exactly, but, as I understood it, there are some individuals living out in some of these towns who claim to have been misled by certain advertisements into believing that the Reclamation Service had the right to construct under the law, and would construct, municipal improvements and build up these towns, and upon the faith of those advertisements they have been induced to invest their money, and have been disappointed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it does not clearly appear that any officer of the Government was responsible for sending out these advertisements. It seems that they got out through some railroad company, and nobody knows where they came from. Certainly it can not be contended here that on account of somebody being misled by the representations of some irresponsible person the Government should respond in damages even to the parties who claim to have been misled and injured, to say nothing of the proposition that such facts would justify the establishment of a great national policy, not only for the present, but for all time to come, of building up towns to be turned over to these people.

But for the sake of the argument, let us say that the Reclamation Service, or some officer of the Government, misapprehending the powers and the authority conferred by the law, did issue this misleading advertisement. Can gentlemen come in here and say that this general policy shall be established because some person here or there was injured by it? Men who deal with the officers of the Government know that they have no power to bind the Government except as authorized by law. Is it the proposition here before the House to-day to establish a great policy for all time to come in order to compensate a few persons in the West who claim to have been injured by this misleading advertisement? If the gentleman can bring up a case here where he can show that the Government is responsible for the injury of any citizen, I will go as far as any man in this House to see that he is compensated and made whole for the damage that he has sustained. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to establish an unwise policy here to-day because some of the gentleman's constituents may have been misled by some officer of the Government or by some irresponsible party whom he can not locate.

Mr. Chairman, there is one other thing to which I call the attention of the gentleman, and that is that while the Interior Department favors some legislation along this line, the Interior Department is now opposed to the passage of this particular bill. The Secretary of the Interior has addressed to me, as chairman of the committee, the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, July 13, 1912.

Hon. W. R. SMITH,
Chairman Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands,
House of Representatives.

SIR: With reference to House bill 23669, "providing for the disposition of town sites in connection with reclamation projects, and for other purposes," as reported by your committee June 12:

Your report suggests certain amendments to the measure as originally drafted in the department and introduced by Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Most of these call for no comment from me at this time, but I deem it proper to express to you the views of the department upon the following points:

In its original form the purpose of the bill was to enable the Secretary to anticipate receipts from the sale of town lots and use a portion of past receipts and of estimated future receipts in municipal and school improvements essential to the well-being and prosperity of the town, but unobtainable in the first years of settlement, because but a small part of the lots are then sold into private ownership and subject to taxation. It was believed that such a policy was necessary to give substantial justice to the inhabitants, and would in the end not deplete the reclamation fund, because of the probability that the price received for the lots would be enhanced by such a policy. In order to safeguard the Government against loss through improvident expenditure there were two limitations put upon the amount to be expended in any town. In the first place, the proposed reclamation town-site fund, out of which such improvements must be paid for, was limited to one-half the proceeds heretofore and hereafter received from the sale of town lots in all towns, so that not only could no money be spent before it had actually been received from the sale of lots, but, moreover, only 50 per cent of such total past receipts could be expended in all towns taken together for this purpose. In the second place, the expenditure in any particular town was further limited to 50 per cent of past receipts from the sale of lots in that town plus 50 per cent of the appraised value of unsold lots. In this connection, attention is called to the fact that it is the practice of the department to appraise the lots from time to time in comparatively small quantities, and in anticipation of the prompt sale of the small portion so appraised.

I understand the effect of the amendment appearing in italics, in lines 10 and 11, of the second page of the bill as printed June 12, to be that there shall be no anticipation of receipts in any town, but that expenditures for the proposed improvements shall be limited to 50 per cent of the cash theretofore actually received from the sale of lots in that particular town. In my judgment, this would defeat the purpose of the bill so far as justice to settlers in towns hereafter created is concerned.

Your committee's proposed substitute for section 4 introduces a new principle in the bill, to wit, that the moneys which under the department's bill were to be paid into the reclamation town-site fund and expended therefrom by the Secretary of the Interior for municipal and school improvements (50 per cent of receipts from lots in all towns as sold) shall, in all towns having a municipal and school organization, be paid over directly to such organization for general municipal and school purposes without the restriction to "improvements" in the nature of permanent works, as contemplated by the original bill. It is thus proposed that the authorities of each town and school district shall have as general town and school revenue 50 per cent of the proceeds of lots sold in each town, respectively. This is a radical departure from the bill proposed by the department. It might be used by the municipal and school authorities to relieve the town of all taxation whatever. There is no means of assuring its wise expenditure in such a way as would enhance the value of the lots and thus increase the reclamation fund. This was an essential part of the bill as originally drawn, and the substitution for it of an unconditioned gratuity to the inhabitants of the towns seems to me unwise.

Respectfully,

WALTER L. FISHER, Secretary.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I do.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The pith of the objection of the department at present appears to be that we have not given power enough to the department in the bill even as amended, while the objection of the gentleman from Texas seems to be that he does not want any authority given to the department.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I do not agree with the Secretary of the Interior, except that I desire the defeat of this bill which is now before the House. I do not believe in the policy of building up towns by the Government.

Mr. MANN. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. July 13, 1912.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, in the discussion of a matter of this sort, in fact in the discussion of any matter, it is a very excellent thing first to learn what the facts are. A wise man has said it is better not to know so much than to know a great deal that is not so. Now, I venture the assertion that with the possible exception of the gentleman from Texas, who has just taken his seat, there is not a Member of this House who will not support this bill, possibly with some slight amendments, if he understands the facts. And I venture the belief that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH] himself would support the measure if he fully understood the facts and the proposition before the House.

Now what are the facts? In carrying out the reclamation law the reclamation officials in some localities took in vast areas of uninhabited and unsettled land—arens 20, 30, and 40 miles in length and 5 and 10 miles in width—without a settler upon them, all public lands. In some cases there were some privately owned lands, but in many cases there were no privately owned lands. It became essential to the carrying out of these enterprises in a proper way that there should be towns established. Where there was a town upon or adjacent to one of these areas no reclamation town site would be established, but where there were not enough towns, or towns so located as to furnish the people with the needed facilities afforded by a town, it became necessary to establish towns, and Congress provided that the service might reserve from settlement under the homestead law certain areas, plat them, sell the lots, and that the funds from the sale should go into the reclamation fund to the credit of the project. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH] talked about gratuities. The Secretary of the Interior talked about gratuities. It is a very good idea in discussing matters of this sort not to use loose and misleading language. This town-site fund is now a gratuity in the sense in which they refer to it. It is a gratuity to the people of the locality. If the project cost, say, $1,000,000 and a town site on the project will bring ultimately, say, $100,000, then the cost of the project to the people on the project is not $1,000,000, but $900,000. This is a proposition to divide the benefits between the farmers on the project and the people in the town. That is all there is to it.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I think it would be well to emphasize the fact that if the site on which it was built was free land it would be open to any homesteader to go there without any remuneration to the Government.

Mr. MONDELL. I was coming to that. Now, as to the necessity of the town sites. The Reclamation Service is not, I think, chargeable with having established town sites where there were towns already established that would adequately and fully serve the people. There have been some localities in my State where people of established towns have been inclined to criticize the service for establishing town sites quite near them.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman from Wyoming yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Not just there, but I will a little later. You must remember that we are providing for intense cultivation on the reclamation projects. We are providing small farms, and in order to have small farms with intense cultivation successful the towns must be placed at reasonable and frequent intervals. The town of Powell is the only reclamation town site in my State. The farms about it are 40-acre farms. The farms beyond are 80 acres, and the farms still farther out 160-acre farms. In establishing these town sites the Government possibly entered upon an operation that gentlemen may claim is somewhat paternalistic and socialistic, but it was necessary. Why? Because the towns were needed, because there was no land upon which private individuals could establish a town. Towns can not be legally established upon a homestead. To establish a town on the land taken by a homesteader would jeopardize the man's entry. But even though a homesteader could go to one of these projects and subdivide his entry into town lots and build up a town, it is not for the interest of the community generally that we encourage that rather than a town established where needed and necessary, the lots sold by the Government for the benefit of the people.

Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH] says that if it is necessary for the Government to do this—and I want to call attention to the fact that the gentleman is opposed to the bill without any regard to what its particular provisions are, that no amendment that anyone could offer to the bill would convince him that it had any virtue—he objects to it in toto, and attempts to prejudice others who may be favorable to the general plan by pointing out alleged faults in the bill. He says if the Government must establish the town sites all of the lots should be sold at once. That is simply to invite speculation. To open one of these town sites out on the open prairie with all the lots to be sold without limit of price would mean that none of the lots would bring any considerable sum. The Government would probably receive very much less for the entire town site under that sort of plan than it receives now for a very small portion of the town site.

The gentleman from Texas, who talks about gratuities to the people in the towns and opposing this, proposes a plan under which the Government would throw to the wind all of the values of these town sites, sell so much at once that no lot in a town site would bring any considerable sum, and the town site as a whole would be sold for a song, and then he declines to give the people of the town the benefit of the song.

Now, the plan adopted by the department is to sell a comparatively small area in the center of a town site, and then, as the necessities of the people increase and the incoming population requires, to open other lots and blocks for sale from time to time. Under this plan the people themselves receive the benefit of the increase of value. The gentleman from Texas defends the old-time plan of giving the speculators the opportunity to speculate in the values created by the industry of others. He does not believe in giving to the people who create the values any part of them. He would divide them among a lot of speculators who might come in and bid these lots in for a song, whereas the plan of the service is, and the plan of the law is, to sell the lots as there is a real demand for them, and to give to the people who created the values the benefit of those values. All we now propose to do is to recognize that the people in the towns are among those who created these values, and that they are entitled to a part of the value which they thus create.

If this were a private town site, this is what would happen: If in the center of one of these projects there chanced to be a tract of land owned by a private individual which he had a right to subdivide, such private individual would to a certainty somewhat improve the property. No one ever heard of a private individual going out and planting a new town without making some improvement upon it. That is true not only of new towns, but true of new subdivisions. The owner oftentimes, at great expense, builds streets, sidewalks, plants trees, oftentimes builds schoolhouses, and in many ways helps the municipality. But the gentleman from Texas insists that the Government shall not do this, and the gentleman from Indiana joins with the gentleman from Texas in his grab scheme for speculators. He insists that the Government shall refuse to do the things that an enlightened land shark would do; he does not want the Government to spend a penny in roads, sidewalks, or municipal improvements of any sort, but would call upon the people to go there and pay considerable sums for these lots and make all of the improvements, when they have no means of raising any considerable sum by taxation.

Let us take the town site of Newell. The town site of Newell contains a section of land. Twenty-four acres of that town site sold at the rate of $2,000 an acre. Let us see what would occur if that section belonged to a private individual. After these first lots were sold and the community was in a position to assess the property, no one will suggest that the outlying lots would be assessed at less than one-tenth of what the lots already sold brought. If in the case of Newell the remainder of the town site were private property and were assessed at one-tenth the amount per acre that the lots sold brought, and the tax levy were 2½ per cent, which is a low levy for a new town, where we have everything to build, the annual payment by the owner in taxes would be about $3,500 a year. Whereas the Government pays absolutely nothing, and there is no source of income whatever except from the taxation of personal property and the few lots that were sold.

The gentleman from Texas is very adroit. He first argues against the bill on the ground that it does not sufficiently limit the time within which the Secretary of the Interior must turn over the improvements to the municipality, and then he quotes approvingly a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, who protests that the bill limits the time too much. Now, there is no possibility of convincing a gentleman who assumes that attitude. He is against the legislation. He has no disposition to be fair with regard to it. The suggestion that there is a possibility that the Secretary of the Interior may be called upon for an unlimited length of time to administer the affairs of these towns because the people fail to organize has no merit whatever.

In the first place, the towns now created have municipal organizations, and the bill could be amended so that not a penny should be expended unless the town is organized, and it would fit every town site, so far as I am informed. Further than that, the people are interested in spending this money themselves, and they would be anxious—would be overanxious, possibly, some might say—that the time should come when they be given the opportunity of expending the money themselves rather than have it expended by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. Chairman, to sum up, certain reclamation town sites are established. They are necessary. In some localities the people were led, when they bought the lots, to believe that a part of the proceeds at least should be used for the improvement of the town, and I think the Reclamation Service had very good reasons to believe that would be done, because at the time there was pending in the House a bill proposing to do that very thing, which, however, was not reported. The proceeds from these town sites now go ultimately to the benefit of the men who create these values, to wit, the men on the adjacent farms. It is proposed to divide that benefit with the people who also create the values—the men in the towns. It does not take a penny out of the Treasury of the United States, directly or indirectly, and any statement to the contrary is not in accordance with the facts. The Government of the United States will have just as much money after this bill passes as it had before, and in the running of the years, under the operation of the bill, the United States will never lose a penny.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. And does it not immediately redound to the benefit of these settlers under the reclamation project?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly; for if the town is improved the remaining lots will sell for more.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH] would have us believe, I imagine, that the Government goes out there and sells town lots at from $500 to $1,500 each and chucks the money into the Treasury. There have been a great many extraordinary things proposed here at one time and another affecting the West, but no one except the gentleman from Texas has ever suggested anything like that. That is not the present situation at all. Under the present law we provide for town sites on the reclamation projects, sell the lots and turn the money over to the settlers. That is the law, and all this bill proposes is that the people in the town shall have a part of the benefit; and their right to it, I have suggested, is based on most excellent grounds. First, they help create the values. If the town sites were privately owned, the lands not sold would be taxed. The tax in the running of the years would amount to more than the 50 per cent of the ultimate sales which we provide.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. Furthermore, any enlightened town site speculator would, before he laid the town out or when he laid it out, build roads, sidewalks, plant trees, and possibly build schoolhouses and do something for the people. The Government does nothing—turns them loose on a piece of raw land and, while it retains its own ownership in nine-tenths of the area until it has advanced in value, expects them to make brick without straw; create values without any taxable basis. How any man upon either side of the aisle can oppose a proposition as fair as this I can not understand, unless he is so wedded to the idea that the Government ought to allow speculators to exploit the people in the sale of town lots that he does not want the Government to establish these town sites and give the increment arising from them to the people who create the value. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, where does the gentleman get the idea that this money received from the sale of town lots goes into the fund of the project?

Mr. MONDELL. It does.

Mr. RAKER. The statute provides to the contrary.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will go to the Reclamation Bureau, he will find that the funds in each one of these town sites is credited to the project.

Mr. RAKER. I am calling the gentleman's attention to the statute.

Mr. MONDELL. The statute bears that interpretation and is so construed. Any proceed from the use of the project which the settlers buy and pay for goes to them as a credit. The settlers buy the project. They pay for it. They are entitled to everything that it contains. Ultimately it does not cost the Government a cent. Would the gentleman—and I am sure he would not—say that the settlers paying for a project should have the Government come within the project and establish a town site, resort to practices that no land shark would be justified in, and turn into the Treasury the money so received? That is what turning it into the reclamation fund generally, without crediting it to the project, would amount to. The thought has been, and the law so provides, that we shall give the people living in the vicinity of these town sites the benefits of the values they create, and all we propose to do is to give half of it to the men who live in the town and half of it to the men who live in the country. Can any gentleman anywhere find it in his heart to oppose that kind of a bill? There may be objections to the details of the bill.

The Secretary says that we do not give him control over this fund for a long enough period. Another gentleman says that we give him the control over the funds for too long a time. The committee attempted to compromise those two views, and so provided that the Secretary in the case of funds now accrued should have the full disposition of them and that in any event within two years after the organization of the municipality he must turn the improvements over; but as to the future receipts, which will come in from time to time from sales, if the town is organized, the funds shall go to the municipal corporation and school district. The Secretary objects to that. He says if you pay over to the municipal organization 50 per cent of the proceeds of the sales of lots from time to time, that the municipality will not sufficiently tax itself; that because the municipality gets a few dollars from the Government it will cease to tax itself. In order to compel the community to tax itself—and I do not know how that will be accomplished—the Secretary insists he must expend that money for their benefit, instead of their spending it themselves. As far as I am personally concerned, any amendment extending the time during which the Secretary shall control, or shortening it, is satisfactory, because I think in any event the matter is going to be properly handled. No funds can be expended except 50 per cent of the funds derived from the sale of the town lots. The Secretary under the bill is to expend those funds already received. In the future, if there is a municipality and school district, they are to expend it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Are these lots when sold, after they go into private ownership, taxable?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman to say a few moments ago there was no possibility of collecting taxes on the lots in the town sites.

Mr. MONDELL. No possibility of collecting taxes from lots not sold. Now, in the city of Newell, 20 acres have been sold out of 640 acres. You can not raise a great deal off of 20 acres of real estate to improve a raw town on the prairie. In the town of Powell, in my State, I think about 10 acres have been sold out of 160. I am not complaining of the policy, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH] does, of retaining the lots until they bring a fair price. I am of the opinion the service has not sold lots as rapidly as perhaps it should have done, but the general policy is correct. There are many advantages. In the first place, it keeps the town centered and does not allow it to scatter all over creation. Therefore it makes municipal improvements cheaper. Second, if this bill, under which the people of the community get the benefit of the sale of lots, becomes a law it is better to retain the lots until they bring a fair price, so that the people who have created the values may receive the values.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman to say in his argument a few moments ago that there were no taxes collectible from any lots within the town sites, and therefore it was necessary to take 50 per cent received from the sale of lots for schools and other municipal improvements.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman could not have been following me closely. I wish to say again that the Government sells these lots slowly—a few at a time. The result is that there is a very small part of the town site taxable. The gentleman could not have been here a few moments ago——

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I have been here right along.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman, then, did not hear my illustration of the town site of Newell. If the town site of Newell, in which a few acres sold for $40,000, had been a private town site, and the remaining land had been assessed at one-tenth of what the lands sold brought, and the rate of taxation had been 2½ per cent, the town would be receiving about $3,500 per annum from taxes from a source from which it now receives nothing.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman mean that the rate of taxation would equal one-tenth of the total value of the lots or that the assessed valuation should be based on the valuation of the lots sold?

Mr. MONDELL. The lots sold for $2,000 per acre. If the remaining land had been assessed at $200 an acre and the tax levy were 2½ per cent, the town would receive over $3,000 per annum in taxes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman did not say that, though.

Mr. McKENZIE. Before these various towns are organized into municipalities—that is, a municipal corporation created under the State law—is there any power for levying a municipal tax?

Mr. MONDELL. None at all.

Mr. McKENZIE. Therefore the town has no fund as a municipal fund?

Mr. MONDELL. None at all. But, as a matter of fact, these towns have, I think, municipal organizations at this time. Let us remember that the funds now received from the sale of these lots is distributed as a credit to all the people on the project.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me ask the gentleman a question there. If that be true, is there any justification in taking 50 per cent of the fund which should be credited to the people who own the project and live upon it and distributing that 50 per cent among the people who happen to live in the municipality?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman had been here at the beginning of my argument, he would know that I tried to show why that would be a fair distribution. The people of the municipality must build schoolhouses, must grade streets, must maintain a municipal organization; they pay high prices for lots and they help create the increased values of the surrounding lots just as much as the people of the country do.

As I said a moment ago, an enlightened speculator would open some of the streets, lay some sidewalks, make some improvements before he sold the lots at all, and then he would be a contributor, not only in taxes, but to the churches, the lodges, and other helpful agencies as long as he owned lots. It is to take the place of the taxes that are not received, of the benefits that can not secure otherwise from the Government, that we propose to give to the people who live in the community the benefit of half of the values which they help to create.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I understood the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to say that the money arising from the sale of these town lots was not put into the reclamation fund, but was credited to the water users under that project. Did I understand the gentleman correctly?

Mr. MONDELL. It goes into the reclamation fund, but it goes there as a credit to the project.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I do not so understand it, and I do not find it in the law.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman may not find it, but that is the fact.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I would like the gentleman to cite me to the law that says that.

Mr. MONDELL. If that were not true this is the situation we would have: The Federal Government going out onto reclamation-project land that is in its natural state worthless, is not worth a dollar an acre, and taking advantage of the values the people on the project created to secure funds to place into the Treasury. Congress has not done any such indefensible thing as that. It has provided and will provide, with regard to any other funds growing out of the utilization and development of a project, that they be credited to it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. In the sale of property in a reclamation district to any person who may wish to settle there, all the funds received from property in a reclamation project from any person who may wish to settle there goes into the Treasury of the United States, and is then used for the benefit of the reclamation project?

Mr. MONDELL. All the funds received from the sale of public lands constitute the reclamation fund. Out of the reclamation funds certain sums are used for the reclamation of a certain area known as a project. The people on that project pay for it; that is, the estimated cost of the project is divided up among the people who enter the land, and they ultimately pay for the project by paying for their land.

Mr. MADDEN. It goes to the price of land that the Government owns, and the Government loans them the money which they pay into the Treasury, and then the Government expends the money for their use?

Mr. MONDELL. They go upon the land, homestead it, cultivate it, live upon it, and pay the cost of reclamation, and when that is all paid the transaction is completed and the Government is paid for what it has done.

Mr. MADDEN. Then this 50 per cent that the gentleman speaks of, the money that is received from the sale of town-site lots, now all goes to the credit of the reclamation fund and is credited to the individuals who buy the land?

Mr. MONDELL. It is credited to the project. For instance, suppose the project cost a million dollars, and under the project there is a town site that will ultimately bring $100,000. The cost of that project, then, will not be a million dollars, but it will be $900,000, and $900,000 will be the amount that the people will have to pay.

Mr. MADDEN. And there is no fund received from any other source except the sales of town lots that are credited to the project?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know if there are any other funds on project now, but there are other sources, such as the development of water power on some of the projects, which will ultimately bring a return.

Mr. MADDEN. But up to the present time there is no means by which the cost of the development of the project can be distributed, and for that reason it is thought wise by this bill to provide that only one-half of that should go to the cancellation of the cost of the development of the project.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; and the other half shall go to the aiding of the development of the municipality.

Mr. MADDEN. I am asking that question.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. If the gentleman's contention is correct, the practice of the department is to credit the proceeds of these town-lot sales to the project. If that is true, the proposition here is to take half the proceeds which are now going to the farmers who are reclaiming their lands on the projects and to divert it to the construction of municipal improvements in the town?

Mr. MONDELL. That is it.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. In other words, you are giving the farmers on the project the benefit of only one-half of the amounts of which they are now obtaining the full benefit?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. If it were not for that the farmers would not get any benefit out of it.

Mr. MONDELL. We think that is a fair and equitable distribution, and the farmers think it is, too. They have seen the plight in which these people have found themselves on the town sites. There is no power to tax the unsold lands of the Government, and there are no resources except the taxation of the lands, which they bought at high prices, and the personal property which they bring in. Considering it is a case of raw land, with everything to do and no source of income, it is the best arrangement, so fair indeed that no man who understands it will object, unless he takes the view of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH] that the Government ought to have nothing to do with town sites; or, if it did, it should have sold them out at once and pocket the money and leave them to shift for themselves.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What is the size of these areas?

Mr. MONDELL. From 160 acres to 640 acres.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is not part of the land sold in the irrigation project?

Mr. MONDELL. I think the department exercises its discretion as to the amount of land that will be needed for municipal purposes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is the security that the Reclamation Service has for recouping itself for the money put into this land?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman from Texas goes on the assumption that all the irrigable lands otherwise would be sold.

Mr. MONDELL. They are homestead lands.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. They would bring in no revenue at all unless there was a town site.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It will bring one-half of the amount of the value, will it?

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that the municipality pays for its water rights, just as a settler does. It pays for the water for a town site.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, the question is whether or not it is right to take one-half of what the land will sell for and give it to the town; is not that the question?

Mr. MONDELL. No. The only question is, Will you let all of it go to reduce the obligation of the surrounding farmers or divide it in two and let half of it go to reduce the obligation of the surrounding farmers and half of it be used in upbuilding the municipality?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then the main thing is the question of how this one-half shall be used—by the Government, through the Secretary of the Interior, in building waterworks or schools and towns, or the municipality doing it for itself. Is not that the question involved here?

Mr. MONDELL. There are two contentions here. One is that the Government should spend the money.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is not that the main question involved here?

Mr. MONDELL. One view, that of the Secretary, is that the department ought to spend all the money, now and in the future. The other is the view that after the municipality is organized the municipality itself ought to spend the money. The committee compromised the matter by providing that as to the funds accrued the Secretary shall spend them, and that he shall continue to do so, if there is not a municipal organization, until there is one, and that as to the future receipts they shall be paid over to the municipal organization, to be expended by it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Now we come to the question directly involved, in my judgment. Does not the gentleman believe that the municipality, acting through its officers, elected by the people, would be the better judge of the size of the waterworks and of the public works and the money to be put into them than the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. MONDELL. So far as the gentleman from Texas now on his feet is concerned, I agree with him fully, and my bill on this subject provided for that very thing; but the committee did not agree with me. They thought the Secretary ought to expend the funds that have accrued and that he ought to have some control possibly for a little time longer. The bill is a compromise on that question of policy, but on the general proposition of giving these towns some part of the values they themselves create there ought to be no difference of opinion. I can not see how there can be any difference of opinion among men who understand the situation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will not the gentleman agree with me that the value of the town lots depends on the building up of the irrigated farms around the town?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; and the farmer receives half of the unearned increment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That makes the town lots of more value and builds up the whole community.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The gentleman continues to talk about the people of the town, who have created the values, being entitled to the benefit of them. I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the most valuable parts of these town sites are the business sites that are sold in the beginning, before there is anybody there, and that the main part of the fund comes from the sale of the town lots before there is any settlement or town there?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, that is only partly true.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I think it is.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, the fund first received comes from the sale of first lots. All the fund comes from the sale of the lots, but as the town grows and develops other lots are sold. The values are created continually by the activity of the people in the vicinity, by their enterprise, and we have recognized that fact by giving to the men on the project the credit for all sums received from the sale of lots, and we propose now to give the men who live in the towns a part of the benefit of those values. We ought to do at least as much as an enlightened land speculator would do, and I think that 50 per cent is just about what, under the ordinary practices of land speculators and the ordinary processes of taxation, the people in a town would get out of the unsold lots.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad to.

Mr. MANN. At present the money derived from the sale of town lots is credited to the expenditures on the project.

Mr. MONDELL. On the project.

Mr. MANN. So as to reduce the total cost of the project.

Mr. MONDELL. So as to reduce the total, and the proposition contained in this bill is to modify that arrangement by giving the benefit of a part of the proceeds to the people of the community.

Mr. MANN. The money that is received from the sale of lands does not go in that same way?

Mr. MONDELL. The money that is received from the sale of lands, of course, is money that goes toward paying for the project.

Mr. MANN. That is money that comes, however, into the Treasury.

Mr. MONDELL. As I illustrated a minute ago, if a project cost $1,000,000 and on that project there was a town site that ultimately would produce $100,000, then the cost of that project is not $1,000,000, but $900,000, and that is the sum to be divided up among the people who pay for the project.

Mr. MANN. At present when a project is carried through they offer the lands for sale upon the basis of the cost of the project?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; offer them for homestead settlement upon payment of a proportionate share of the cost of the entire project.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. What lands does the gentleman refer to—homestead lands?

Mr. MANN. Homestead lands.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. They are not sold. They are given away outright.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says they are not sold. They are in fact sold. The people have to pay the cost of the project.

Mr. MONDELL. In addition to cultivation and residence.

Mr. MANN. In addition to cultivation and residence.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Of course, no one knows what the lands will sell for, except by taking the cost of the project. Now, in fixing the cost of the project, do they subtract from that the estimated value of the town site?

Mr. MONDELL. I fear they do not.

Mr. MANN. I thought they did not.

Mr. MONDELL. I think, as a matter of fact, they have based all their prices on an estimate so high that there can not be any possibility of the cost of the project, with any credit that may come to it, exceeding the aggregate of the moneys they will obtain, and I doubt if the service does subtract anything of that sort.

Mr. MANN. So that practically, in the main, the value of these lots when sold goes into the general reclamation fund?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman might say that is true in practice, because you can not get down to the last penny; but I assume that ultimately the reclamation projects will not cost the settlers more than the total of the expenditures, less any credits that may come in, so that as a matter of fact this is a credit.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Now, as I understand the gentleman, take a project that cost $1,000,000, if there is a town site in which the lots sold for $100,000, at present there is $900,000 charged up to the farmers to be paid back.

Mr. MONDELL. That would be the sum.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. If this bill passes, they would be charged with $950,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Fifty thousand dollars, then, that they would not have to pay if the bill did not pass.

Mr. MONDELL. That might be true.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Then, there is $50,000 coming out of the farmers.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman from Texas gets any comfort out of that fact, he is welcome to it. The gentleman keeps reiterating it and keeps enlarging upon the wrongs to the farmer. He is against the measure in toto in any form whatever, and therefore he is desirous of prejudicing it.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The gentleman from Wyoming is doing me an injustice.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman objects to any town facilities at all. He wants to put the lots up at auction and let the speculators purchase them and leave the people to the tender mercies of the speculators as far as their future is concerned. The present plan may strike the gentleman as being paternalistic or socialistic, I do not care what he calls it, the name does not frighten me at all, providing it is proper and the right thing to do and that it works well.

The Government sells a reasonable amount of lots in the center of a town, and the tendency is to keep the town in an orderly way of development, and as the lots outside increase in value it credits the farmers with all the value that they largely create. It is proposed to give a part of the value to the people of the town and a part to the farmers.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Wyoming yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I had supposed the theory of the proposition was that if you agreed to spend a certain proportion of the money for these lots for municipal improvements the other lots would sell for much more than they would if the improvements were not made.

Mr. MONDELL. That is true; I had not touched on that feature of the matter at length for lack of time. It is an important consideration.

Mr. MANN. That is right in connection with the answer which the gentleman from Wyoming made to the question propounded by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MONDELL. I thank the gentleman from Illinois for his suggestion; it is an excellent one. The farmers themselves, instead of losing anything, will be the beneficiaries, because the other lots will sell for much more than they would if there was no municipal improvement like schools and waterworks, and so forth. The farmers come into town and enjoy the benefit of these improvements; they enjoy the benefits of the schools.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I see that the gentleman has caught onto the significance of my suggestion awhile ago as brought out by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that as you increase the value of the lots of this town you increase the amount that the settlers will get the benefit of and be credited to them. As the lots are increased in value they are only getting 50 per cent of it and that decreases the amount that the settlers have got to pay back.

Mr. MONDELL. I happened to be in the vicinity of the town of Powell at the time of a recent sale of town lots and I heard the suggestion made by intending purchasers that they were indisposed to pay any considerable price for the lots, because there were few municipal improvements. The people have not been able to make them, and therefore the lots were not so desirable. We propose by this legislation to modify the present practice in this particular, that instead of the creators of this wealth outside of the town receiving all the benefits, we wish to divide the benefits among the creators of the wealth within the town and outside the town. There may be some differences of opinion in regard to details, but as far as I am concerned the judgment of the committee in the matter of these details, whatever it is, I am sure will be satisfactory to me.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

TOWN SITES IN CONNECTION WITH RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, being one of the members of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands that gave this bill consideration, and also on the subcommittee, I feel as though at this time I ought to state my reasons, in as few words as I can, and as clear as I can, as to why it appears to me the bill ought not to pass. That has been set out in the minority report filed by the chairman and myself. It seems to me there are many reasons why this bill ought not to become a law.

I listened attentively to the gentlemen who have preceded me advocating the bill, and I find their main argument is that it might build up the town, that it might assist somewhat in the improvement of the town, and it might prevent speculation, all of which statements are imaginary.

It is not very hard for us to turn back to the beginning of the land legislation in regard to town sites. Years before the reclamation project was ever conceived of, ample provision under all land laws was made for town sites, and they have extended them to all of the Territories and to Alaska. You will find in the history of the 60 years that no contention has been made here that the towns can not or will not improve, and that it was necessary for the Federal Government to take up and start out and open a campaign of municipal improvements. You can go over the Western States and find many of these towns to-day flourishing where the land was taken up originally under the town-site acts and under the law administered admirably by the trustees or by the judge of the county, and the land all disposed of to private owners, schoolhouses built, and other improvements made.

This, now, is a move to take the funds that go to the Reclamation Service, that are caused by virtue of the building up of the country by the farmers and the Reclamation Service surrounding it and have the Government of the United States, through the Secretary of the Interior, embark upon a policy that no State, nor this Government, has ever yet sanctioned, namely, that we should go to work and build up public squares in towns, that we should build up schoolhouses in towns, that we should build water systems for municipalities, that we should build electric-light plants for municipalities, and that we should build their roads and byways and town halls, and make every conceivable improvement that could be provided for under a municipal government. It resolved itself in my mind to this, first and formal——

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Just a moment. Does the Government intend, through its officers and the bureaus here in Washington, to conduct municipalities 3,000 miles away from the seat of Government? I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman if he knows whether, under the law under which the town sites were disposed of in Oklahoma, Congress did not provide that the money derived from the sale of town lots should be used for municipal improvements, waterworks, and so forth?

Mr. RAKER. That question is not involved in the position that I am taking.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I understood the gentleman to state that the Government never has heretofore undertaken anything of this kind.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no. That does not cover the question. If Congress should see its way clear——

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman another question.
